I believe that the Government of the United States owes it to the farmer to start the export corporation out of the Treasury of the United States. Therefore I favor deferring application of the equalization fee and putting it on later. The bill itself does that. It is not out of harmony with the idea I have just expressed. If the bill passes and becomes a law, no equalization fee will be put on under its terms until the other method has been tried out.

The information we have from the previous veto of the President is that he will not sign a bill with the equalization fee in it. I believe all of the other objections have been substantially removed; and since we are deferring the equalization fee by the terms of the bill, it seems to me we might just as well pass a bill which will be signed as one that will be vetoed. Therefore, why not strike out this provision for the present? Under the terms of the bill we are going to try the other method during the summer; and if it does not work, then when we assemble again we can put on the equalization fee, if it shall become necessary

So it seems to me that as a matter of merely good common horse sense we ought to take this provision out of the bill and avoid that controversy. If we are going to pass a bill of this kind, we ought to pass one that will give the farmer some immediate relief. There will be no chance of relief if the bill shall be vetoed, unless it can be passed over the veto, which nobody believes. Accordingly, I favor at this time striking out the equalization fee.

In the substitute which I have offered there is no equalization fee. I have provided that, up to $600,000,000, the Treasury of the United States shall stand the loss, and there are eloquent reasons why that should be done. The Republican platform has promised it; the Democratic platform has promised that equality; and no man who views the question from the standpoint of the farmer can deny that the farmer is entitled to ask from the Treasury a similar support to that which has been given to other industries. Why, then, put in the equalization fee and destroy the farmer's immediate chance of relief?

I receive letters every week about the foreclosures of farm loans. I am called on all the way from my State by those who are losing all of their life savings. I want some immediate relief if we can get it. I do not think $400,000,000 is adequate, but it will start operations.

The debenture scheme would be second best to a system of financing in full by the Government.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that we should do a wise thing and would take this issue out of politics if for the present we would eliminate the equalization fee and pass a bill which would be signed. Then we shall be able to ascertain if it does any good. In the end I think we shall have to take substantially the substitute I am offering here, which is substantially what the Senator from Nebraska offered several years ago, and substantially what the Senator from Oregon offered in his first bill. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall at this time vote to eliminate the equalization fee from the bill.

Mr. STECK. Mr. President, the amendment upon which we are about to vote, to strike out the equalization fee, is, so far as the farmers of Iowa and the Middle West are concerned, the most important question that the Senate will have to decide in the consideration of the pending bill. I believe that I speak the will and wishes of the farmers of that section and of Iowa when I say to the Senate that they do not desire to have the equalization fee eliminated. The farmers of Iowa, through their spokesmen, the farm organizations of that State, the Legislature of Iowa, and all other bodies which claim in any degree to represent them and have spoken on this subject, have said that they do not care for this bill unless it shall contain the equalization fee. I therefore hope that the pending amendment will be defeated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT].

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should hesitate further to discuss this subject if the pending amendment were not so important. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] has proposed the elimination of the equalization fee, which goes to the heart of this entire proposal. I have never assumed that the Senator from Kentucky was particularly favorable to the legislation. Hence I think I may assume without any reflection on him to say that the amendment comes from an unfriendly source. I think the Senator from Kentucky was on the floor of the Senate last year and voted against the proposal. But, Mr. President, there is a great principle involved in the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to eliminate the equalization fee. We might as well meet the issue fairly, because this is the first opportunity we have had directly since this measure has been before Congress for our consideration in the past four years to do so.

I think everyone who is a student of farm problems, everybody who realizes the economic forces that have brought about the depression in agriculture, must realize that the surplus produced is what has brought the farmer to his present state, which has obtained since the summer of 1920. If we are all agreed upon that fundamental, it should not be difficult to apply a remedy. All have agreed upon that theory; at least, I have heard no Senator on this floor raise his voice in opposition to the statement that the surplus of production prevents the farmer from realizing the full benefit of the highly protected domestic market.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield for a question?

Mr. McNARY. I shall do so later. I always yield but at the proper time, if I may.

I may say, Mr. President, out of respect to the good faith of the Senator from Iowa, that his proposal proceeds upon the same theory that the farm problem is a surplus problem. Wherein do we differ? The Senator from Iowa proposes to fix a price for farm products based upon the cost of production to the farmer plus 5 per cent upon the capital invested. The pending bill proceeds upon the theory that the board will buy in the open market at a price exactly protected by the American tariff that is made available for industries. That is one departure.

The second departure is that the pending bill proposes that the farmer, through an equalization fee, shall carry his own load. The proposal of the Senator from Iowa proceeds upon the theory that the money shall come from the Treasury to absorb the losses incident to the handling of the surplus, whether it is by withholding for orderly marketing or for the purpose of purchase and sale abroad at the lower plane levels of foreign prices.

Mr. President, I do not think the proposer of this amendment or those who may support it, if they will reflect for a minute, will believe that they are acting kindly toward and to the benefit of the farmers of the country.

The farmer knows—and I think if there is any intelligent class in this country it is the farmer—if he comes to the Congress and asks for some substitute for this bill which shall provide that all the losses incident to the administration of the bill shall fall upon the taxpayers of the country that it will not be enduring and abiding legislation. The farmer knows, Mr. President, if we to-day eliminate the equalization fee, and the loss next year shall be $100,000,000 or in excess thereof, or even less than that, and he comes back the next year with a loss and asks the taxpayers generally, who are not interested in the great agricultural industry, to pay such loss that the benefit given to him by reason of the subtlety of the pending amendment will destroy his economic condition. He knows, Mr. President, that the purpose is not to be overgenerous to him. He is conscious of the fact that if the equalization fee shall be eliminated from this bill in only a year or two the rising tide of protest will be so great as to engulf him. He knows that the Congress through the years to come when he produces a surplus annually over and over again is not going to meet the losses due to such surplus out of the Treasury of the United States. He wants no present benefit without paying for it. He is not asking for or seeking a beneficence; he has never in his long career in this country asked for charity in any respect. The farmer, be it said to his credit, has always fought subsidies in every form. His voice has always been raised against those appeals that call for drafts upon the Treasury. He has fought every such effort made by any of our industries or institutions when they have been presented in the form of legislative proposals. He has fought to destroy and defeat everything that has been in the nature of a subsidy.

Now, why should those who pretend to be friends to the farmer, when there is not a farmer in the country who has asked for legislation of the kind proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, say to him, "You must take this legislation; you must submit to having drafts made upon the Treasury of the United States." He only has one answer to that, Mr. President, and that is that the suggestion is not made in good faith.

Queer it is to me, indeed, that such a proposal should be made when, with almost a unanimity of action, sanctioned in meetings of farm organizations, of cooperative associations, of legislatures throughout the country, the farmers have asked simply for—what? Not for money, Mr. President. They do not want the taxpayers' money.

They merely want an opportunity to be placed on an equal footing with industry and labor, and that is the purpose and foundation and inspiration of this bill. They simply want the Congress in a legislative way to create for them an economic structure, and to provide the machinery whereby they may find their place of equality in the industrial life of America. They ask for that kindness and that interest upon the part of the Congress, but they do not ask for compensation; they are willing to pay the cost of it themselves.

That brings me to the equalization fee.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McNARY. I will ask the Senator please to permit me to proceed. I always try to be brief. I shall gladly yield to the Senator later.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator's appeal to me is made in such an irresistible manner that there is nothing for me to do but to sit down.

Mr. McNARY. Some inquiring mind has suggested this afternoon what is the equalization fee.

> But knowledge to their eyes her ample page,
> Rich with the spoils of time, did ne'er unroll.

That applies to one of the distinguished literary Senators of this body. Anyone who understands the philosophy of economics, anyone who is a student of legislation understands, Mr. President, the purpose of the equalization fee; whence it comes, what it does, and where it goes. If a marketing agreement is entered into and the price of any farm commodity receives the full benefit designed to be accorded by the protective tariff to which it is entitled and which it will have, there are two agencies that can pay for it. One is the taxpayers indiscriminately and generally; the other is the beneficiaries of the legislation. That little exaction does not come out of the farmer as such. When he sells his product the equalization fee is withheld. He never receives it. He receives the larger benefit made possible by the withholding of the product, or its sale in foreign markets.

That is the equalization fee. It is paid for by the farmer himself. He is in exactly the same position as the manufacturer; and I am not here to protect the manufacturer, though I have not heard the voice of those who are here and who are charged with not paying an equalization fee; but any of us who have any knowledge of business conditions know that the manufacturer, when he sells his surplus products abroad, suffers a loss. He absorbs that loss; but if he were working in groups and in organizations together, side by side in great numbers, they perhaps would call it an equalization fee.

The farmer does not receive the full benefit. He receives more than the manufacturer, because he produces a surplus. That is the penalty of a surplus, my friends, and not a penalty inflicted upon this form of legislation.

Strange it is to me, my friends, when the farmers of the country have asked this machinery and are willing to pay for its operation, knowing that it is not a present-day remedy but a permanent one, fashioned to meet the farmer's economic needs, that anyone here should say to him, "You can not have this instrumentality. Even though you want it and are willing to pay for it, you can not have it." And yet that is the way you are dealing with the farmers to-day.

As chairman at the present time of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and one who has been more or less in charge of this bill for a number of years, I say with knowledge that what I have stated can not be contradicted; that all the farm groups that have any organization whatsoever, outside of the National Grange, have espoused this cause, have clung to the equalization fee, have said it was the heart, the blood, the bone, the sinew, and the flesh of the legislation which they so much desired.

I have had experience in that line, Mr. President. Last year, in a frame of mind desirous of doing something for the farmers of the country; anxious, indeed, that this controversy might end; hoping that all differences might be composed between those who opposed the equalization fee and those who did not want any legislation and those who were satisfied with merely cooperative organizations and those who wanted a subsidy, I also conceived the idea of bringing about a compromise, and suggested a plan whereby the losses might be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. I found, to the glory of the farm organizations of the country, that unanimously all were opposed to it, and said, "We do not want any subsidy. We want to make our way through. We know what a subsidy would bring upon our heads. We are not asking for charity. We want to pay this in our own way."

Mr. President, I went further. I need not relate any experiences at the White House, as some have done. I read a few messages and published statements of the President of the United States, and if there is one thing he has said that has been emphatic it is, "I am opposed to any subsidies for the farmers of the country."

If there are those here—and there may be many—who are privileged to speak for the White House and the distinguished occupant thereof, I should like to have their observations at this point, and I pause.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] had some suggestions to offer as to what the White House might do in this matter. I suggest that he answer the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator please, I do not want any controversy. I shall yield at the proper time, and with graciousness, if I may.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. McNARY. So, Mr. President, we have come to this situation: You can take the measure and emasculate it, and make it look attractive to the unthinking individual or the individual who has not at heart the interest of the farmer permanently and vote this equalization fee out. If you do, my friends, I warn you, you will not be back here another year asking for an appropriation. That will be the finish of legislation for the farmer. Or you can give him what he wants, without any cost to the taxpayers of the country, and that is this bill.

Mr. President, there was some gossip some weeks ago about the attitude of the Corn Belt committee of 22, which comprises the representatives of the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Farmers' Union, and so forth, in 22 of the hog, corn, and wheat-growing States of the country.

It was said here in whispered terms last week that that organization was not whole-heartedly for this bill. Here is the last expression of the farmers in that section of the country—and it reaches into the South—who are in sore need, and responsible for this legislation. I ask unanimous consent that it may be read from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., April 4, 1928.

HON. CHARLES L. McNARY,
United States Senate:

Corn Belt Federation meeting, held April 3, was attended by representatives from 23 of the affiliated organized groups composing the Corn Belt Federation. Two resolutions were passed unanimously by the federation, as follows:

Resolution 1: After a careful consideration of the Senate farm relief bill, the Corn Belt committee desires to state that it cordially approves of the general provisions of this measure, and trusts that it will be passed by an overwhelming vote. There are certain amendments which we hope may be made, whether in the Senate or the House, and a description of these amendments will be immediately supplied to the farm representatives in Washington.

Resolution 2: We strongly insist that article (b) of section 5, under the heading of "Loans," be stricken out. We feel that no loans should be made to any cooperative for the purpose of conducting membership campaigns, and that the provision above referred to discriminates against the voluntary type of organization as in favor of the contract type. We also earnestly recommend that equal provision be made to finance the operation of voluntary cooperatives with that made for contract organizations, and that the terms used in defining the character of acceptable security and method of repayment of loans by voluntary groups be made equally specific as in the case of contract cooperatives. The language of clause 2 and of lines 11 to 16, following article (c), on page 33, under the head "Loans," are clearly discriminatory against the voluntary type of organization.

A. W. RICKER.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I only need observe that the amendments which have been suggested have been offered and will be approved by this body.

While it is perhaps not very important, a difference has arisen on the floor this afternoon as to the attitude of those who may speak for Iowa. I have the following telegram, which I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DES MOINES, IOWA, March 15, 1928.

Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY,
Chairman of Agricultural Committee, Washington, D. C.:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 9

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa:

SECTION 1. That the Senate of the Forty-second General Assembly of Iowa convened in extra session, the House concurring, hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to pass at this session effective agricultural surplus control legislation as embodied in the McNary bill in the Senate and the Haugen bill in the House, each containing the equalization fee.

SEC. 2. That a copy of this resolution shall be transmitted by wire to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to the chairman of the agricultural committees of each House of Congress.

Foregoing resolution adopted by the General Assembly of Iowa in special session March 14, 1928.

WALTER H. BEAM, Secretary of Senate.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, just one word before I conclude.

A great effort was made by the committee and those truly representing agriculture to meet the various objections of the President. A sincere effort has been made by all the Members of this body to prepare a bill which perhaps will meet with the general accord of the farmers. I hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky will not be adopted. If it is adopted, the work that has been done by the farm groups of the country, whether organized or unorganized, and those who have given much of their time and work in the Halls of Congress, will have been nullified.

In behalf of the farmers, as I believe I can speak at this time, I ask that they be permitted to work out or attempt to work out their own economic salvation under such a plan as has been devised and reported three times by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of this body, passed once, and vetoed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish to make any speech, but I do wish to explain the vote that I propose to cast upon this question.

When I made the point of order a little while ago, I was under the impression—and I say this by way of apology to the Chair—that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama was to the section proposed to be stricken out. The fact had not been brought to my attention that it refers to another section of the bill; but I want to assure the Senator from Alabama and those who agree with him, and who therefore insist upon this amendment, that, so far as I am advised, there will be no trouble about the adoption of the amendment when it is reached in its regular order.

Mr. President, I have been convinced for some time that the farmers, except probably the cotton farmers of this country, were not in favor of this character of legislation unless there was some provision made by which they could properly and certainly to a large extent, if not altogether, control production. They have realized the fact that if they could not control production, the losses under a measure of this sort might be too great to be undertaken.

I do not believe, therefore, that it would be possible to secure the votes necessary to pass this bill in this body, at least, if the equalization fee were eliminated from it. I think the position taken by these western farmers that they did not want charity, but that they did want security against overproduction that might be ruinous to their industry, is a very commendable and reasonable position; and I do not at all complain of the persistence with which they insist upon the equalization fee.

The South is somewhat differently situated with respect to cotton. The South produces about twice as much cotton as the Nation consumes. A little more than one-half of all we produce is exported. The exportations of cotton are greater than the exportations of all other agricultural products in this country combined. Our proposition is a proposition purely of taking care of the surplus in case of a year when the crop far exceeds the world's demands upon us for this essential product.

I know that there are Senators here who object to an equalization fee being placed upon cotton. I know there are Senators here who are perfectly willing that the Government shall appropriate a revolving fund, to be advanced to the cotton farmers of the South to help them control the surplus. They know that unless they can control the surplus in a year of overproduction, the price of cotton will fall below the cost of production. They know that it must in some way or other be controlled.

We have attempted to control it to some extent through the organization of cooperative associations, but that scheme has not worked any very great practical benefit in the direction of the solution of this problem, so many farmers remaining out of the cooperative associations, and while the cotton the associations withdraw from the market helps to boost up the price, if there is a loss those few farmers who belong to the association have to pay it.

It is suggested now by the Senator who makes this motion that we strike out the equalization fee, and let the revolving fund of $400,000,000 remain. Under the bill, cotton would get probably $150,000,000 of that, because it is apportioned upon the ratable basis of the exportable surpluses of the several products, and our exportable surplus is so large in comparison to those of other products that cotton would probably get somewhere between $125,000,000 and $150,000,000 from that fund.

It is proposed to let this remain in the bill, and strike out the equalization fee. Who is going to get that $125,000,000? How are they going to get it? Is the Government going to give it to the cotton farmers? Not at all. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] has said that we loaned the railroads some six or seven hundred million dollars. I think we did. It was some very large amount; I do not remember the exact sum. But we required the railroads, when we let them have that money, to give the Government good and sufficient security for its repayment.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. On that proposition, we voted in the Esch-Cummins bill a subsidy.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not talking about a subsidy. I am talking about this bill. I am just trying to get away from the idea of subsidy. I am trying to impress upon the Senate that the South does not want a subsidy, and the South knows it is not going to get a subsidy. The railroads did not get a subsidy when we loaned them that money. They gave security to return that money, and they have returned most of it to the Treasury.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I refuse to yield until I finish this thought.

Mr. BROOKHART. I wanted to——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not going to yield until I finish this thought, and then I will yield.

We loaned the money to them upon good and sufficient security, and only upon those conditions. We have never proposed to lend the farmers of the South any money under any other conditions, and if this equalization fee is stricken out, there is no chance of this bill passing this body unless we provide that the money advanced to the farmers out of the revolving fund shall be secured, and amply secured.

Who is to secure it? It is to be loaned, if loaned at all, to cooperative associations or farmers' organizations. The cooperative associations of farmers' organizations probably will in most of the States be composed of a minority of the farmers. If they borrow that money, and borrow it upon good and sufficient security, whether by pledging the cotton itself, or giving outside security for it, and there is a loss in this effort of theirs to prize up the price of cotton, the few members who belong to the cooperative associations will have to pay entirely any loss sustained, although the operation is for the benefit of all the cotton farmers in the South.

We will not get any money without security in that event. It will be seen, as soon as the equalization fee is stricken out, that there will be an insistence here that the money advanced to the cotton farmer out of the revolving fund shall be secured in the way I have suggested, and that the losses, if any, shall be paid by the minority of farmers who go into the cooperative associations and farm organizations.

That is what the cooperative associations have been doing. They have been borrowing money to help support and advance the price of cotton, and have been buying in the cotton. They have sustained very heavy losses in some instances. The farmers who are not members have benefited without sustaining any loss whatever.

This proposition in the bill with the equalization fee retained is that $125,000,000, we will say, of the revolving fund is to be loaned to the cooperative associations and farmers' organizations for the purpose of enabling them to withdraw a sufficient amount of cotton from the market to stabilize the price of cotton. It will have that effect. If I had two hundred or two hundred and fifty million dollars to-day—and with $125,000,000 I could borrow more money—if I had that much money in my hand and could go upon the market and announce my purpose to buy in two or three hundred million dollars worth of cotton, and store it, and withdraw it from the market until the price went up, I have no question in the world that the price of cotton to-morrow would be advanced to 25 cents.

It was for this reason that Secretary Jardine said, when we were discussing the first bill on the subject, that cotton was the one product involved in the measure which would sustain no loss by reason of the imposition of an equalization fee, and it will not sustain any loss, because the cotton farmers of the South will be enabled to withdraw from the market enough to stabilize the market, enough to put the price of cotton up. They will start out in the beginning buying at a certain price. As they buy the price will advance, and finally the price will reach a point of parity with domestic prices of other products, and instead of losing, they will gain, they will make money, as any private speculator can make money who is able to withdraw a sufficient quantity of cotton from the market. He will not lose in the transaction. All he has to do is to gauge the amount necessary to be withdrawn for the purpose of advancing the price.

We have a committee now considering the cotton question, and they have evidence that where certain speculators have dumped a great quantity of cotton, pooled for the purpose of breaking the market, the mere dumping that cotton upon the market suddenly resulted in a substantial fall in the price. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina if that has not been shown in the testimony the committee is taking?

The proposition can be reversed, and if you will buy in enough, you raise the price; and if you raise the price by this process, how is the farmer going to lose by reason of the equalization fee? But it is said, let them all go into a cooperative association, put all the cotton of the country in a cooperative association, and let the cooperatives sell it, and let them withdraw as much as they please from the market for the purpose of stabilizing the market. Suppose the equalization fee should be stricken out and all the farmers should join the cooperative associations. Even in that case, I have no doubt that the cost to the individual farmer arising from assessments to pay the cost of organization, insurance, storage, and marketing through those associations, no part of which could ever be recovered, would be fully equal, if not in excess of any equalization fee that will ever be imposed on him under the pending bill.

Mr. President, I am not unpatriotic enough to ask a bounty. I am perfectly willing that cotton should receive equal treatment with other agricultural products. I am saying that cotton is in such a situation that it does not endanger any cotton producer, however small a farmer he is, if he goes in and subjects himself to this equalization fee; because in the end, as Mr. Jardine said, he will not lose; on the contrary, he will almost certainly gain.

It is impossible to get all the farmers into a cooperative association. We never could get more than 15 or 20 per cent in our State under the most intensive drives in favor of the cooperative system. The Senator from South Carolina, one of the best-informed and most eloquent and effective stump speakers in this country, came to my State representing the cooperatives and canvassed a portion of the State in behalf of membership in such an association, but even with his efforts and the efforts of a number of other able gentlemen canvassing the State, appealing to the farmers, they never succeeded in getting more than 20 per cent of the farmers in the cooperative associations, and there are not 10 per cent of them in them now.

This bill provides that instead of the small number of farmers who go into the cooperative associations in the vain hope of withdrawing enough cotton to advance the price of it and having to bear the whole burden themselves, which is in itself a large burden, that every cotton farmer shall participate in that burden, and every farmer producing the commodity shall participate in the benefits.

Mr. President, I do not think the southern farmers will object to that.

If the commodity is brought under the bill, as now drawn, it will be with the consent of the producers, and if the producers should become dissatisfied, they can withdraw their commodity from the operation of the act. They can get out of the system if they wish to do so.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] said to-day that this would force all cotton to be sold through this plan and that the equalization fee would apply. I was interested in the Senator's statement that it was left to those only who wished to go into it. That is a very important matter, on which I am anxious to get light.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I was not discussing that question. I was discussing the matter of bringing a commodity under the operation of the act and of withdrawing it if the producers should later wish to do so, all of which would have to be done by the consent of the council selected by those producers. And I was showing that contrary to the existing situation where the minority of farmers who belong to the farmers' organizations have to carry all the burden for the benefit of all, under this bill while loans are made to the farmers' organizations, such organizations invest that money in the way provided in the bill for the benefit of all, and if there is any resulting loss, then all the farmers who raise cotton contribute to that loss, as well as share in the gains and benefits of the operation.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina, unintentionally of course, misquoted my statement in reference to the railroad proposition. He said that I claimed some $600,000,000 was paid to the railroads and that that was a loan which the railroads must secure and pay back. I did not refer to the loans made to the railroads at all. Loans were made in addition to the item that I mentioned. I want to make it clear now what I was talking about. I want there to be no misunderstanding.

Under section 209 of the transportation act as amended by section 212 a guaranty was given to the railroads of the war-time profits for the first six months after they were turned back, and that is the subsidy about which I was talking. On March 31 I received the following letter from the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 31, 1928.

Hon. SMITH W. BROOKHART,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: As requested by telephone this morning, the following is a statement with respect to section 209 of the transportation act, 1920, as amended by section 212—guaranty to carriers after termination of Federal control:

(1) Number of carriers accepting the guaranty	667
(2) Total amount claimed by carriers	$680,077,801.30
(3) Number of cases dismissed to date	137
(4) Number of cases settled to date	521
(5) Amount certified in cases which have been settled, including advances and partial payments	$528,876,411.51
(6) Amount certified as advances or partial payments in cases not settled	$402,500.00
(7) Total amount certified	$529,278,911.51
(8) Number of cases remaining unsettled	9
(9) Balance estimated as being payable under guaranty	$250,000.00

This statement is as of February 29, 1928. You will note that the total amount that has been certified to the Secretary of Treasury under this section, as amended, is $529,278,911.51, and the estimated balance due is $250,000.

Respectfully,

G. B. MCGINTY, Secretary.

Mr. President, that money was paid as a direct subsidy to guarantee the war-time profits of the railroads after they were turned back in 1920. That burden was put in part upon the farmers of the United States. The burden of a protective tariff and advanced prices is also by law put upon the farmers of the United States. A burden of high interest rates, by a banking system created by a law of the Nation, and a burden of deflation by a board appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, were put by law upon the farmers of the United States. A burden is put upon the farmers by law in paying the high rates of return to the public utilities, no court deciding less than 7 per cent, although the American people are only producing 5½ per cent.

After a record of subsidies like that it is not a question of subsidy but it is a question of doing equal justice to the farmers. That is the proposition for which I stand. I know that the farmers of my State are behind that proposition, for I have seen more of them than all the other leaders of every kind in the State. I know what they think about it, because I have talked to them about it. I shall go back and explain to them what has been done here. I shall tell them the inside of the situation. They are not going to be fooled by this talk that the farmers do not want a charity. It is not a charity. It is justice. It is the equality to which they are entitled. We should give them out of the Treasury of the United States, in the first instance, the money to start this institution.

I do not object to the equalization fee. I have said that I believe it is constitutional, although many of the lawyers hold the other way. I shall vote for the equalization fee if we may give the farmers the other item of justice ahead of it to which they are justly entitled. But I say we have no right to run away from the proposition and say we have done all that the farmers are entitled to have done for them. It is not fair to the farmers.

On that basis, if we start this institution at Government expense as we started the railroads, we will find out how it works, we will know something about the equalization fee then or the excise tax, which would be the same thing if the court holds the equalization fee unconstitutional.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. Every word the Senator from Iowa has uttered about subsidies is true. I think there is no doubt about what the Congress should do for the farmer so far as appropriations are concerned in the way of restitution for the almost criminal wrongs that have been inflicted upon the agricultural class. However, the distinguished Senator from Iowa a short time ago stated that the President would sign a bill containing what is known as a subsidy, but would not sign a bill containing the equalization fee.

Mr. BROOKHART. The President has declared against subsidies, too, but this bill as it stands now, as I understand it, has in it what the President would not call a subsidy. It is a loan. It is a subsidy so far as that is concerned. The President would not sign my bill. I do not claim that.

Mr. McMASTER. That is the point I am trying to get at.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not claim that.

Mr. McMASTER. Then, if we vote for the Senator's substitute this afternoon, we simply vote for it as a protest in the name of agriculture, but knowing that we accomplish nothing definite so far as the farmer is concerned.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is true. If we vote for the other bill, we do just the same thing, only we do not protest for agriculture anything like as strong as the protest that it is entitled to have.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the President is going to veto either sort of bill we send up to him, why not send one the farmers want instead of sending one they do not want?

Mr. BROOKHART. I can not agree with the conclusion either that this is what the farmers want. I should not call it "my" bill. It is more the bill of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] than it is mine. I copied most of it out of his bill. It is more the bill of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] than it is mine. I copied almost exactly what was provided in the original McNary bill. It is not my bill. It is a bill expressing what I think to be the rights of the farmer. If both of the bills are going to be vetoed, I would like to go back and be able to say to my farmers that I made a fight for all they are entitled to have. I do not want to go back and say to them that I compromised it all the way but a little at the end, and then got that much vetoed. That is the situation which exists here now.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief reply to the Senator's remarks which were directed to me, and I am going to say this, whether we get a vote or not.

The Senator knows that I had no reference whatever to the Esch-Cummins law and the bounty which that act bestowed upon the railroads. I am as much opposed to that as is the Senator, and I would like to see it repealed. I had no reference either to the matter of the tariff. I know some of the tariff exactions upon the people are mere bounties to the great manufacturers and producers in the country. I was referring simply to cases where the Government had provided for the loan of money or the advancement of money, and the Government has never yet, since the war, directly advanced money out of the Treasury without requiring security. It required a security when we loaned the railroads the large sums of money about which the Senator spoke the other day, to enable them to stabilize the transportation service of the Nation. I am not justifying it at all. It was done, but it was done only upon the railroads giving what might be called bankable security for it.

The Government also provided a farm-loan bank to loan to farmers, but it required the farmers to give good and sufficient security for the money. The Government also provided an intermediate system of farm loans for the purpose of taking care of the crops of the farmers. It required that that money should be loaned upon ample security, and "ample security" has been construed to be securities worth twice as much as the amount of money advanced.

I meant that I did not believe in this instance, if the equalization fee were stricken out, that it would be likely that we could get the bill either through this body or the other body, or if we should get it through both bodies, that it would be approved at the White House, if we join in agreeing to advance so much of this revolving fund to the agricultural interests of the country, or if we do not provide security to indemnify the Government against loss in that case just as in the case of the railroads. I am not opposed to any legislation which the Congress may enact to benefit the farmer. I want all of that that we can get. He needs it. But when it comes to advancing money directly to him, I do not believe the Government is going to do it without requiring him to return that money.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the trouble is that we have made no fight for the farmers' rights on that proposition. We have surrendered them and let them go, while we have talked loans or revolving funds and then quit.

Mr. SIMMONS. The passage of this bill should not interfere with the Senator in making the fight.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; it will not. I do not intend to quit this fight until it is won.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] to strike out section 8, the equalization fee provision, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], but I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness in his family. If he were present, on this question he would vote "nay." My colleague is paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. NEELY's name was called). The senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. McNARY (when Mr. STEIWER's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] has a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay," and if the Senator from New Jersey were present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PHIPPS. On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. I am informed, however, that if the Senator from Georgia were present he would vote for the amendment. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STEPHENS. On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following pairs on the pending question:

The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]; and

The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—31

Bayard	Dale	Harris	Sackett
Bingham	Edwards	Heflin	Shortridge
Black	Fess	Keyes	Swanson
Blaine	Gerry	McLean	Tydings
Blease	Glass	Metcalf	Walsh, Mass.

NOT VOTING—16

Bratton	Gillett	Neely	Steiwer
du Pont	Gould	Reed, Mo.	Stephens
Edge	Howell	Robinson, Ark.	Trammell
George	King	Smoot	Walsh, Mont.

So Mr. SACKETT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer an amendment which I ask the clerk to read. I should state that amendment has been agreed upon after the debate of to-day.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to withdraw the two amendments relative to the constitution of the advisory council, the one offered by myself and the one offered by the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], and to offer the amendment which I now send to the desk in lieu thereof.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. Is not the amendment which has been proposed by the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk informs the Chair that the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama was not in order at the time it was submitted.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator from Alabama renew the amendment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall renew the amendment later, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from Alabama will permit the amendment which I have offered to be voted on, as it has apparently been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee and the amendment to it offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will now report the amendment submitted by the Senator from Tennessee.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5 it is proposed to strike out line 17 and down through the period in line 1 on page 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the board is organized or whenever it determines that any agricultural commodity may thereafter require stabilization by the board through marketing agreements authorized by this act, or whenever the cooperative associations, or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity, shall apply to the board for the creation and appointment of an advisory council for such commodity then the board shall at once proceed to constitute an advisory council.

An advisory council to represent each of the commodities affected under the provisions of this act shall be selected as follows: Within 30 days after the board herein provided for shall be appointed and organized the board shall cause to be sent to each cooperative association or other organization representative of the commodity a notice that, among other things, they shall nominate not more than seven persons to be members of the advisory council. Within 30 days after such notice each association or other farm organization representative of such commodity shall file with the board the name or names of its nominees. Within 10 days thereafter the board shall certify down to such cooperative associations or other organizations a list of such nominees, stating by which association and from which State they were nominated. Within 30 days thereafter such cooperative associations or other organizations representative of such commodity shall vote for not more than seven of said nominees so certified to be members of the advisory council, and forward their votes to the board at Washington. Within 20 days thereafter the board shall tabulate the votes, and the seven names receiving the highest number of votes shall constitute the advisory council for such commodity for a period of 12 months thereafter or until their successors shall be elected and shall qualify. Vacancies on the council shall be filled in like manner. No cooperative association or other organization shall have more than one vote, but may vote for seven nominees. Within 30 days after said council shall be elected it shall organize by selecting one of its members to be chairman and another secretary.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I do not object to a vote on the amendment, but I desire to ask for a unanimous consent agreement when the vote shall have been taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that a vote may be taken on this amendment, as it appears to be satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the debate be limited on the bill and all amendments proposed thereto to 10 minutes to each Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Before the Senator from Minnesota takes up his amendment, I desire to say that we were about to reach an agreement on an amendment that I offered on page 13, at the end of line 18, before the word "agencies," to insert the word "farm"; and at the end of line 20, before the word "agencies," to insert "farm." If agreed to, the amendment would confine the activities of the board to farmers, putting the handling of the fund, and all that, in the hands of the farmers. That is the purpose of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 12 of the original print, line 25, before the word "agencies," it is proposed to insert the word "farm," so that it will read "agreement with other farm agencies"; and on page 13, line 1, following the word "other," to insert the word "farm," so that it will read "between such other farm agencies."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Using the original bill, on page 7, line 25, and page 8, line 1, strike out " members' marketing contracts or by others."

On page 8, lines 7 to 10, strike out "to furnish funds to the association for necessary expenditures in federating, consolidating, merging, or extending the membership of cooperative associations, or (C)."

On page 8, lines 17 and 18, strike out "delivered to the association under its members' marketing contracts" and insert in lieu thereof "handled by the association."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for a division.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. McNARY. I do not think the demand has been seconded.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. HEFLIN. But what is it?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, this amendment merely removes a discriminatory feature in the bill as between contract cooperatives and voluntary cooperatives. It puts them on an equal basis. It is an amendment asked for by all of the cooperative organizations, in fact, all farm organizations; and it is at their request that this amendment is presented to the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if I may add just one word, this amendment was contained in a telegram I had read a few moments ago, stating the action of a recent meeting in St. Paul, Minn. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I call for a division.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will restate the amendment.

The amendment was restated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 24, after line 6, it is proposed to add the following:

That losses may occur from the export of agricultural commodities sold in the world markets at a lower price than the basic price of purchase herein provided, together with the expenses of exportation. Such losses shall be paid from the United States Treasury until they reach the total sum of $600,000,000, which is deemed to be equal to the subsidy paid the railroads the first six months after they were turned back to private ownership under the transportation act, plus the profits to the Government in the wheat corporation during the World War. Thereafter they shall be paid by an equalization fee or excise tax as Congress may determine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 12, line 2, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "therefor" down to and including line 7 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 9. The Department of Agriculture shall determine the average cost of production to farmers of each agricultural commodity having an exportable surplus for the five preceding years, and also the financial investment therein, using the official census data as far as possible, and report the same to this cooperative as the price basis for the current year. The items of cost shall be estimated upon the same principles as in the manufacturing industry, and considering the individual farm as a business unit, and determined on its individual production, including a fair compensation to farm owners for management and labor of themselves and families, together with proper allowances for depreciation of soil, improvements, equipment, stock-breeding animals, work animals, and buildings. The cooperative shall then offer to the farmers a price equal to this average cost of production plus enough profit to yield 5 per cent upon the capital investment. The cooperative shall also have the right to buy and sell agricultural food products in processed form when such processing is necessary for preservation, but only when the parties so processing them have paid to the farmers the basic price above indicated and have added thereto only enough for a net profit of 5 per cent upon their own investment. The board of directors shall establish an efficient agency to determine compliance with this last provision.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 26, line 21, after the word "vegetable," I move to strike out the period and insert the words "beef or beef product."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 26 of the original bill, line 21, after the amendment heretofore agreed to, after the word "vegetable," it is proposed to insert "beef or beef product."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 24 of the original bill, line 1, after the numerals "$250,000,000," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, At least that $200,000,000 of said revolving fund is hereby made available and shall be used as a stabilization fund for financing the purchase, withholding, or the disposal of agricultural products in the event that a marketing period shall be declared for one or more of such products as hereinbefore authorized, and that said fund shall be allocated ratably to the stabilization funds of the several products according to the values of their respective exportable surpluses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following:

That Mr. MCNARY be chairman and Mr. BROOKHART secretary of the board.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute. Since the substitute has been printed I think it need not be read. There is one correction suggested by the Comptroller General that goes with it that might be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the reading of the amendment will be dispensed with, except for the modification referred to.

The CHIEF CLERK. The modification is as follows:

SEC. 25. All financial transactions of the board, cooperative and Federal farm operating boards shall be audited by the General Accounting Office, at such times and in such manner as the Comptroller General of the United States may prescribe. He shall also prescribe the accounting forms and procedures for such transactions.

It is also proposed to renumber sections 25 to 30, and make such sections 26 to 31, respectively.

Mr. BROOKHART'S amendment, in the nature of a substitute, is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That this act may be cited as the "Farmers' Export Cooperative Act of 1928."

DEFINITION

SECTION 1. As used in this act—

The term "agricultural products" means agricultural, horticultural, viticultural, and dairy products, livestock, and products thereof, the products of poultry and bee raising, the edible products of forestry, and any and all products raised or produced on farms and processed or manufactured products thereof, transported or intended to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce.

SEC. 2. That three persons (who shall be the directors first appointed as hereinafter provided) are hereby created a body corporate and politic in deed and in law, by the name, style, and title of the farmers' national export cooperative, hereinafter called "the cooperative," and the directorate are designated as "the board."

SEC. 3. The capital stock of the cooperative shall be $250,000,000, all of which shall be in the first instance subscribed by the United States of America, and such subscriptions shall be called upon the vote of the majority of the directors of the cooperative at such time or times as may be deemed advisable. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000,000, also so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose of making payment upon such subscription when and as called. Receipts for payment by the United States of America for or on account of such stock shall be issued by the cooperative to the Secretary of the Treasury and shall be evidence of stock ownership.

SEC. 4. The management of the cooperative shall be vested in a board of directors consisting of three persons to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, one of whom shall be nominated by the American Farm Bureau Federation, one by the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, and one by the National Grange and Patrons of Husbandry. The first appointments shall be for two, four, and six years, respectively, and these lengths of terms shall be determined by lot, and thereafter their successors shall be appointed for a term of six years. Each of the directors appointed as herein provided shall devote his time to the business of the cooperative. Before entering upon his duties, each of the directors so appointed and each officer shall take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office. Vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as original appointments except that a person appointed shall be appointed for the unexpired term of the member he succeeds. Two members of the board of directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

SEC. 5. That the three directors of the cooperative shall each receive annual salaries, payable monthly, of $10,000. No director shall receive any other salary or compensation or be otherwise in the employ of the United States or of any State or private corporation or person.

SEC. 6. That the principal office of the cooperative shall be located in the District of Columbia. Agencies or branch offices may be established under rules and regulations prescribed by the board of directors.

SEC. 7. The cooperative shall be empowered and authorized to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal which shall be judicially noticed; to make contracts; to purchase or lease and hold or to dispose of such real estate as may be necessary for the prosecution of its business; to sue and be sued; to complain and defend in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal; may make such regulations as are necessary to execute the functions vested in it by this act; to appoint by its board of directors, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are necessary for the transaction of the business of the cooperative; to define their duties and require bonds of them and fix the penalties therefor; to dismiss at pleasure such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents, subject to the provisions of the civil service laws, and make such expenditures (including expenditures for rent and personal services at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books, periodicals and books of reference, and for printing and binding) as may be necessary for the execution of the functions vested in the cooperative and as may be provided for by the Congress from time to time. All expenditures of the cooperative shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman; and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted, and the rights, privileges, and powers granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed and it may prescribe the powers and duties of its officers and agents, except as herein otherwise specifically provided.

The general purpose and business of the cooperative shall be to purchase from the farmers of the United States enough of agricultural products to include the entire exportable surplus and so much for interstate commerce as the board may determine, and to pay therefor the average cost of production plus a margin of profit sufficient to yield 5 per cent per annum upon the farmers' capital investment; also to process and to store and to market said products and to export such as can not be marketed in the United States.

(1) To keep continuously advised upon agricultural, commercial, financial, and legal matters which, in the opinion of the cooperative, affect interstate or foreign commerce in agricultural products or derivatives or fabrications thereof.

(2) Upon its own initiative or upon petition of any cooperative marketing association, to call into conference cooperative marketing associations engaged in the handling of the same commodity or commodities with a view to assisting in the organization by such cooperative associations of a national or regional duly incorporated cooperative marketing association, to act as the common marketing agent of such cooperative associations, in the interest of the producers of such commodity or commodities.

(3) Upon petition of any cooperative marketing association handling a surplus commodity to confer and advise with such association with respect to—

(a) The disposition and marketing of such commodity, including agricultural, commercial, financial, and legal matters which, in the opinion of the cooperative, affect interstate or foreign commerce in such commodity.

(b) The holding of conferences between such association and one or more other cooperative marketing associations handling such commodity, or nonmember producers of such commodity upon the production of such commodity during the ensuing 12 months in order to secure the volume of production required in the public interest.

(c) The negotiation of agreements between such association and one or more other cooperative marketing associations handling such commodity, and between such association or associations and nonmember producers of such commodity providing for the establishment of pools, exchanges, special funds, or other cooperative undertakings in prevention or disposition of a surplus of such commodity.

(4) To make loans to any cooperative marketing association, or to any cooperative association created by two or more of such cooperative marketing associations to act as a common agent in marketing any agricultural commodity. Such loans may be either secured or unsecured and may be made to assist in the orderly marketing of the products of such associations or for the acquirement of properties and facilities, or for both, or for any purpose not in conflict with the intent and purposes of this act, and upon such terms and conditions as the cooperative may prescribe, subject to the following conditions and limitations:

(a) In the making of loans the cooperative shall exercise care and diligence to satisfy itself that there is a reasonable prospect of repayment.

(b) That in case other or additional provisions for payment are not prescribed by the cooperative, any association receiving a loan shall provide for the payment thereof, including interest thereon, in a manner approved by the cooperative, during a period not exceeding 33 years.

(c) That any association receiving a loan shall submit such reports of its transactions and audits of its accounts as the cooperative shall prescribe, but such information shall not be disclosed by the cooperative or any member or employee thereof except upon a demand of Congress or an order of a court of competent jurisdiction.

(d) Any cooperative association procuring a loan as herein provided shall subscribe for capital stock in the said cooperative to the amount of 5 per cent of such loan, as provided in section 19.

SEC. 8. That the cooperative shall be empowered and authorized to issue and have outstanding at any time its bonds in amount aggregating not more than five times its paid-in capital, such bonds to mature not less than one year and not more than five years from the respective date of issue and to bear such rate or rates of interest as may be reasonable before maturity, at the option of the cooperative, as may be determined by the board of directors. Such bonds shall have a first and paramount floating charge on all assets of the cooperative, and the cooperative shall not at any time mortgage or pledge any of its assets, and the Government of the United States shall be liable for said bonds. Such bonds may be issued at not less than par in payment of any obligation authorized by this act or may be offered for sale publicly to any person at such price or prices as the board of directors may determine, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 9. The Department of Agriculture shall determine the average cost of production to farmers of each agricultural commodity having an exportable surplus, for the five preceding years, and also the financial investment therein, using the official census data as far as possible, and report the same to this cooperative as the price basis for the current year. The items of cost shall be estimated upon the same principles as in the manufacturing industry, and considering the individual farm as a business unit, and determined on its individual production, including a fair compensation to farm owners for management and labor of themselves and families, together with proper allowances for depreciation of soil, improvements, equipment, stock-breeding animals, work animals, and buildings. The cooperative shall then offer to the farmers a price equal to this average cost of production plus enough profit to yield 5 per cent upon the capital investment. The cooperative shall also have the right to buy and sell agricultural food products in processed form when such processing is necessary for preservation, but only when the parties so processing them have paid to the farmers the basic price above indicated and have added thereto only enough for a net profit of 5 per cent upon their own investment. The board of directors shall establish an efficient agency to determine compliance with this last provision.

SEC. 10. If in its operation the said cooperative acquires more than the exportable surplus of agriculture, it shall have the right to dispose of the same in the domestic market and as nearly as practicable shall dispose of same at a net profit not exceeding 5 per cent.

SEC. 11. That for the purposes herein specified in handling and export of the surplus in agricultural commodities said board of directors shall establish a commodity "advisory board" for each commodity having an exportable surplus, hereinafter referred to as the "advisory board," to consist of representatives of each of the said commodities, and not to exceed five members and to serve without salary. Said board of directors shall, as soon as practicable after the enactment of this act, after conference with the bona fide farm organizations and cooperative associations in each district which it considers to be representative of agriculture, prescribe the number of members to be elected for each commodity and provide by regulation for the election of members of the first advisory boards. The term of office of each member first elected shall expire one year from the date of this act, and vacancies during such period shall be filled in the same manner as the original election. Thereafter successors shall be elected and vacancies shall be filled as prescribed by the board of directors. Any member in office at the expiration of the term for which he was elected may continue in office until his successor takes office. The members of such advisory boards may be paid a per diem compensation not exceeding $20 for attending the meetings of the advisory board. Each member shall be paid by the board his traveling expenses to and from the meetings of the advisory board and his actual expenses while engaged upon the business of the advisory board.

SEC. 12. Duties of the advisory boards.

(a) The advisory board of each commodity shall meet as soon as practicable after the enactment of this act and nominate to the board of directors 18 individuals eligible for appointment to the operating board for said commodity.

(b) They shall meet thereafter at least twice in each year at a time and place designated by the board of directors or upon a petition duly signed by a majority of individuals at a time and place designated therein.

(c) They shall nominate upon request of the board of directors individuals to fill vacancies occurring in the operating boards.

(d) They shall consider such questions and formulate such recommendations in respect to cooperative marketing, and cooperate with the board of directors and with the operating board in such manner as the advisory boards shall deem most effective for carrying out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 13. Selecting from those recommended by the respective advisory boards, the board of directors shall establish a "Federal farm operating board" for each commodity, to be composed of three members, one of whom shall be designated as chairman, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall be ex officio a member of each of said Federal farm operating boards.

SEC. 14. Terms of office of the first two appointed members shall expire at the end of the second year, the next two at the end of the fourth year, and the next two at the end of the sixth year after the date of the enactment of this act. Their successors shall hold office for a period of six years and until their successors are appointed and qualified. Vacancies shall be filled upon recommendation of the advisory board in the same manner as the original appointments. Each of the appointed members shall be a citizen of the United States, shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as a member of the operating board, and shall receive a salary not exceeding $10,000 a year, to be fixed by the board, together with actual and necessary traveling and subsisting expenses while away from the principal office of the board on business required by this act.

SEC. 15. The Federal farm operating boards shall have active charge of the handling and export of all agricultural commodities and of their exchange in interstate commerce and of exercising all the powers of the cooperative as hereinafter defined and as prescribed by the rules and regulations of the board of directors.

SEC. 16. That losses may occur from the export of agricultural commodities sold in the world markets at a lower price than the basic price of purchase herein provided, together with the expenses of exportation. Such losses shall be paid from the United States Treasury until they reach the total sum of $600,000,000, which is deemed to be equal to the subsidy paid the railroads the first six months after they were turned back to private ownership under the transportation act, plus the profits to the Government in the wheat corporation during the World War. Thereafter they shall be paid by an equalization fee or excise tax as Congress may determine.

SEC. 17. That any and all bonds issued by the cooperative shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes. The cooperative, including its franchise and the capital and reserve or surplus thereof and the income derived therefrom shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States or any local taxing authority, except that any real property of the cooperative shall be subject to State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed.

SEC. 18. That wherever practicable products purchased and exported as a result of an advance under the provisions of this act shall be shipped in vessels documented under the laws of the United States.

SEC. 19. All of the cooperative organizations organized in compliance with the laws of the various States and in compliance with the laws of the United States as hereinafter defined shall have the right to subscribe for stock in said cooperative, and said subscription shall be used to redeem and pay off the bonds and Government capital outstanding against said cooperative. When all said bonds and capital have been redeemed the said cooperative shall become a cooperative organization under the laws of the United States, to be controlled and operated as defined and provided in the next section.

SEC. 20. Authority is hereby granted under the laws of the United States to 100 or more persons to organize cooperative organizations or associations upon the terms and definitions prescribed in this section, as follows:

1. Each member of any such cooperative association shall have one vote, and the capital stock of such association shall not vote in its control. Two or more cooperative associations shall have the right to subscribe for all the stock in an association for the purpose of federation, and when capital stock is so held by other cooperative associations, then the vote shall be in proportion to the membership of each association subscribing for such stock and the stock itself shall not vote, and this provision shall apply to the cooperative herein created.

2. The net earnings of all cooperative associations for the purpose of dividend upon the capital stock shall not exceed 5 per cent per annum, but deficiencies in any year may be made up in subsequent years, but the capital stock shall not upon liquidation or otherwise receive any dividend in excess of said sum of 5 per cent per annum.

3. All of the earnings of a cooperative association over and above the earnings of capital and the operating expenses shall be held either in surplus or for the purpose of trade dividends. Unless directed by a vote of the membership 25 per cent of said net earnings shall be kept in the business as a surplus for the enlargement, growth, and safety of the business. This surplus may be used to reduce the capital stock upon a vote of the membership. The other net earnings may be distributed back to the members in trade dividends in proportion to the amount of business each member shall transact with the enterprise. In the case where the membership is composed of other cooperative associations the trade dividends shall be paid in the same way to such association and by them distributed to their members as provided for other profits and earnings.

4. Cooperative associations engaged in trade and merchandising shall transact their business for cash or its equivalent.

5. Individual memberships in any cooperative association having individual members shall not exceed $100 in cost, and memberships of cooperative associations in federated associations shall not exceed $1,000 in cost.

6. Cooperative associations shall be composed of individuals who voluntarily join.

7. There shall be unlimited membership. No reason shall exclude a person from membership except that his purpose may be injurious to the society.

8. Each member shall patronize the society in any commercial enterprise in which it engages so long as it supplies his needs as advantageously as other agencies.

9. Persons who have not sufficient capital to pay for initial stock may be permitted to join the society and they may permit the savings returns accruing from their patronage to be applied to the share for their capital.

10. Cooperative associations shall have the right to set off not exceeding 5 per cent of the surplus savings for educational and organization purposes in the field of cooperation.

11. That at each inventory depreciation shall be charged off against the property of the society in conformity with sound business principles.

SEC. 21. The ultimate aim of the cooperative organization shall be to supply the needs of the members, to attain the control of the necessary production, to encourage membership, to promote other societies, to create national organizations, and to effect a union of the societies of the world in an international organization having the same common purpose.

SEC. 22. Credit unions and mutual cooperative banks established by the laws of the various States, and cooperative national banks that provide for the payment of a trade dividend to borrowers and depositors, shall have the right to subscribe for stock and become members in this export cooperative and in federated cooperative associations provided in this section.

SEC. 23. Whoever (1) falsely makes, forges, or counterfeits any bond, coupon, or paper in imitation of or purporting to be in imitation of a bond or coupon issued by the cooperative; or (2) passes, utters, or publishes any false, forged, or counterfeited, bond, coupon, or paper purporting to be issued by the corporation, knowing the same to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited; or (3) falsely alters any such bond, coupon, or paper; or (4) passes, utters, or publishes as true any falsely altered or spurious bond, coupon, or paper issued or purporting to have been issued by the corporation, knowing the same to be falsely altered or spurious, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to direct and use the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department to detect, arrest, and deliver into the custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction on any person committing any of the offenses punishable under this section.

SEC. 24. That the corporation shall make a report to Congress as soon as possible after each calendar year relating to the business transacted during the preceding year, stating as of the 1st day of each month (1) the total amount of capital paid in; (2) the total amount of bonds issued; (3) the total amount of bonds outstanding; (4) a list of the classes and amounts of securities taken under this act; (5) a detailed statement of receipts and expenditures; (6) the number of cooperative associations becoming members of other cooperatives and the total amount of capital stock paid in by them; (7) the number of individual members in all cooperative associations affiliated with the cooperative; and (8) such other information as may be hereinafter required by either House of Congress.

SEC. 25. All financial transactions of the board, cooperative and Federal farm operating boards, shall be audited by the General Accounting Office, at such times and in such manner as the Comptroller General of the United States may prescribe. He shall also prescribe the accounting forms and procedures for such transactions.

SEC. 26. Cooperatives may be organized under this law by filing articles in substantial compliance herewith with the Secretary of Agriculture, signed and acknowledged before a notary public by at least 10 members. Said articles shall contain the name of the principal place of business, the names of at least the minimum membership required, the names of the first officers, whether or not the same is organized upon membership fees or capital stock, the amount of each membership fee, and the amount of capital stock, if any, together with the rate of return thereon. Upon the filing of such articles the Secretary of Agriculture shall issue a certificate of authority to transact business under this act and such cooperative shall be subject to service and jurisdiction of the courts and with rights to sue as ordinary corporations. This act is the only authority required for the parent cooperative herein created.

SEC. 27. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, which may be used by the parent cooperative herein created for administration expenses and loans to assist in the organization of other cooperatives herein authorized and a rate of interest not higher than 4 per cent. The board of directors shall prescribe regulations for the repayment of such loans and all moneys repaid shall be covered into such fund.

APPLICATION OF ANTITRUST LAWS

SEC. 28. The cooperative herein created and all other cooperatives organized under the provisions of this act shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed marketing agencies within the meaning of that term as used in the provisions of the first section of the act entitled "An act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products," approved February 18, 1922, and in the same manner and to the same extent as associations included in such act shall be subject to the provisions of section 2 thereof.

COOPERATION WITH EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

SEC. 29. To foster, encourage, and promote the cooperative processing, preparing for market, handling, pooling, storing, and marketing of agricultural commodities under this act and to assist in the establishment and maintenance of all cooperatives herein authorized, any Government establishment in the executive branch of the Government shall, in accordance with its written request to the head of such Government establishment, cooperate with such cooperatives to such extent as the head of such Government establishment deems compatible with the interests of the Government.

SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

SEC. 30. If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the applicability thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

RESERVATION OF RIGHT TO AMEND

SEC. 31. The Congress of the United States reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the provisions of this act.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to provide for buying, storing, processing, and marketing agricultural products in interstate and foreign commerce and especially for thus handling the exportable surplus of agriculture in the United States, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. HARRISON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. NEELY's name was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I desire to announce my pair as on the previous vote. I understand that if the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] were present, he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD]. In his absence I withhold my vote, not knowing how he would vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 5, nays 64, as follows:

YEAS—5

Bayard	Blease	Borah	Brookhart
Blaine

NAYS—64

Ashurst	Fletcher	McKellar	Sackett
Barkley	Frazier	McMaster	Schall
Bingham	Gerry	McNary	Sheppard
Black	Goff	Mayfield	Shipstead
Broussard	Gooding	Metcalf	Simmons
Bruce	Greene	Moses	Steck
Capper	Hale	Norbeck	Thomas
Caraway	Harris	Norris	Tydings
Copeland	Harrison	Nye	Tyson
Couzens	Hawes	Oddie	Vandenberg
Curtis	Hayden	Overman	Wagner
Cutting	Heflin	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Dale	Jones	Pine	Warren
Deneen	Kendrick	Pittman	Waterman
Dill	Keyes	Ransdell	Watson
Edwards	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.	Wheeler

NOT VOTING—24

Bratton	Glass	Neely	Smoot
du Pont	Gould	Reed, Mo.	Steiwer
Edge	Howell	Reed, Pa.	Stephens
Fess	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.	Swanson
George	King	Shortridge	Trammell
Gillett	McLean	Smith	Walsh, Mont.

So Mr. BROOKHART's amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNARY (when Mr. EDGE's name was called). The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is paired with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]. If the Senator from Oregon were present, he would vote "yea," and if the Senator from New Jersey were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. GEORGE's name was called). The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. Before he left he asked me to announce that if he could be present when the final vote on the bill was taken, he would vote for the bill if certain amendments were added. Those amendments have been made to the bill.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family. If he were present on this vote, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. JOHNSON's name was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] if present would vote "yea" on this roll call.

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. NEELY's name was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, announcing my pair as on previous votes, I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CARAWAY (when the name of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas was called). My colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] is unavoidably detained in his apartment on account of illness. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

I desire also to announce that if the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] were present he would vote "yea," and if the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] were present he would vote "nay."

I also want to announce that if the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] were present they would vote "yea," and that if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] were present they would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—53

Ashurst	Fletcher	Mayfield	Simmons
Barkley	Frazier	Norbeck	Smith
Black	Gooding	Norris	Steck
Blaine	Harris	Nye	Stephens
Brookhart	Harrison	Oddie	Thomas
Broussard	Hawes	Overman	Tyson
Capper	Hayden	Pine	Vandenberg
Caraway	Heflin	Pittman	Wagner
Copeland	Jones	Ransdell	Waterman
Couzens	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Curtis	La Follette	Sackett	Wheeler
Cutting	McKellar	Schall
Deneen	McMaster	Sheppard
Dill	McNary	Shipstead

NAYS—23

Bayard	Edwards	Hale	Shortridge
Bingham	Fess	Keyes	Swanson
Blease	Gerry	Metcalf	Tydings
Borah	Glass	Moses	Walsh, Mass.
Bruce	Goff	Phipps	Warren
Dale	Greene	Reed, Pa.

NOT VOTING—17

Bratton	Gould	Neely	Trammell
du Pont	Howell	Reed, Mo.	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
George	King	Smoot
Gillett	McLean	Steiwer

So the bill was passed.

BOULDER DAM

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD my minority views on Senate bill 728, together with a letter from Mr. John L. Gust and extracts from a speech by Hon. Dwight B. Heard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOULDER CANYON PROJECT

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, submitted the following minority views (to accompany S. 728):

The Colorado River is our most remarkable and dramatic river in its value for irrigation and hydroelectric energy. It combines concentration of fall, sites for power plants, reservoir sites for controlling the river flow, and a vast volume of water for irrigating several million acres of land.

Other rivers may be used either for irrigation or for hydroelectric power, but no other river in the Western Hemisphere presents such opportunity for the use of waters for both irrigation and generating electrical energy.

In approaching the problems of a river so pregnant with possibilities for development it is important that all the factors connected therewith—engineering and economic—should be fully evaluated and that expediency shall play no part therein.

It is the opinion of all experts that there is no surplus water in the Colorado River, therefore in any plan of developing that river extreme care should be exercised so that no practicable potentiality shall be needlessly sacrificed.

MAGNITUDE OF THE PROPOSED PROJECT

The project authorized by this bill is majestic in its proportions. The figures involved are stupendous.

The proposed dam will be 675 feet high from bedrock to its crest; 125 feet below and 550 feet above the present water level, or nearly twice as high as any other dam in existence.

It is stated in the Twenty-fifth Annual Report of the Bureau of Reclamation, that the total capacity of all of the reservoirs at storage dams authorized by Congress to be constructed by the Bureau of Reclamation, and including reservoirs at dams on Federal reclamation projects which were financed and constructed by agencies other than the Reclamation Bureau, when completed will be only 13,863,123 acre-feet of water. The hydroelectric power now installed by the Bureau of Reclamation is 55,000 horsepower.

The Boulder Reservoir, when full, will hold 26,000,000 acre-feet of water, and store 20,000,000 acre-feet. It is proposed to install machinery to develop 1,000,000 horsepower, of which 550,000 horsepower will be firm power; in other words, this dam will create a reservoir which will store approximately twice as much water as all the Reclamation Service reservoirs combined and will represent an electrical installation of ten times as much as that now installed by the Bureau of Reclamation.

The total construction cost of all of the projects constructed by that bureau as of June 30, 1926, was $166,532,562.36. The estimated cost of a portion of this project will be $125,000,000. The members of the Federal Power Commission, and many engineers who have testified concerning the project, state that these cost estimates for the project are too low.

Secretary Work, in submitting to Congress the Weymouth report on the Boulder Dam and this project, said that this project presents "engineering difficulties attractive to ambitious engineers if not to Government or private capital."

ARIZONA

Ninety-three per cent of the entire area of the State of Arizona is within and constitutes 43 per cent of the total area of the Colorado River drainage basin.

Arizona contributes about 30 per cent of the waters of the Colorado River. The population of Arizona residing within the Colorado River Basin and dependent entirely upon its waters is equal to, and probably exceeds, the combined population furnished to the Colorado River Basin by the other Colorado River Basin States.

Of the 6,000,000 firm horsepower of potential hydroelectric energy in the lower basin, seven-eighths thereof is in Arizona, but the Boulder Canyon plan of development, as proposed in S. 728, would deprive Arizona of the benefit of this hydroelectric power.

Of the lands in Arizona susceptible of irrigation, practically all thereof to be irrigated must obtain their water from the Colorado River or its tributaries in Arizona; they have no other waters from which to draw.

The Colorado River enters Arizona from Utah near what is called the Crossing of the Fathers and flows through Arizona on a meandered line 315 miles to the Arizona-Nevada State line, in Iceberg Canyon. From this point the river on a meandered line forms the western boundary line of Arizona for a distance of 400 miles to the point where it intersects the boundary line between Arizona and Old Mexico.

CALIFORNIA

Only 2½ per cent of the Colorado River drainage basin is in California.

California contributes practically no water to the Colorado River.

The Boulder Canyon plan of development allots to California 38 per cent of the estimated constant water supply of the Colorado River.

California has 18,000,000 acres of land irrigable by waters other than by the waters of the Colorado River.

Of potential hydroelectric energy, California has 9,000,000 horsepower which may be developed within her borders on streams other than the Colorado River or its tributaries.

This bill sedulously and intentionally proposes to sever Arizona's jugular vein.

The bill is intended to be, and is, an attempt to coerce Arizona. One administration unsuccessfully attempted to coerce Arizona into joint statehood with New Mexico. Another administration unsuccessfully attempted to coerce Arizona upon certain provisions of her constitution, and those who are attempting by this legislation to coerce Arizona will ultimately discover that they have simply been standing like large locomotives on a sidetrack, without driving rods, wasting their steam in vociferous and futile sibilation.

TITLE I

STATEMENT OF SPECIFIC OBJECTIONS

I object to this bill for the following reasons:

1. Because the bill authorizes an invasion of the State of Arizona without its consent and over its protest; it is a trespass upon the soverignty of Arizona and is therefore unconstitutional.

2. Because the bill proposes (sec. 12 (c), p. 20) to deny to Arizona her right to use the public lands within that State—which comprise 63 per cent of the total area of the State—for the purpose of building canals or other works, to enable citizens of that State to use the water which falls upon the soil and which runs in the brooks, creeks, washes, and rivers of Arizona for domestic and agricultural purposes and also proposes to deny to Arizona the use of public lands for the building of transmission lines for the purpose of delivering electrical energy developed on streams which are within the State and also proposes to deny to Arizona the right to obtain a permit from the Federal Power Commission to build dams on streams wholly within Arizona, to utilize water for the development of electrical energy to which the citizens of Arizona have already acquired the right to the exclusive use thereof.

3. Because if the bill (sec. 8 (c) were passes in its present form it would plunge the State of Arizona into expensive and protracted litigation. Because it denies the authority of Arizona to amend her own constitution.

4. Because Arizona joins with the upper basin States in asking (quoting Governor Dern, of Utah, Senate hearings on S. 728, p. 132) "that no legislation proposing the construction of any project upon the Colorado River should be enacted by Congress or otherwise authorized by any Federal agencies before the negotiations now in progress have been completed, and every reasonable effort exhausted to reach such an agreement between the seven States."

5. Because the construction of any large storage project on the main Colorado River, in the absence of a specific allocation of water to Arizona, will make water available for use in Mexico, and thereby ultimately deprive the lands in Arizona of its use.

6. Because the bill proposes the invasion of the State of Arizona by the Federal Government and the usurpation of the use of the bed of the Colorado River, its banks, and the lands within the State for the construction of a dam for the storage of water and the delivery of this water to another State to the detriment of Arizona. The water in question is a natural resource over which the State of Arizona claims the exclusive right (except as it affects navigation) to control within its own boundaries, and to share the control of its use where the river forms the boundary between Arizona and another State, subject only to the limitation that the water shall not be depleted in such an amount as to deprive a prior and beneficial user in another State of the water appropriated by him. (Boquillas Cattle Co. v. Curtis, 213 U. S. 339, and Colorado v. Wyoming, 259 U. S. 419.)

7. Because under the terms of the bill Arizona will be deprived of the use of water essential for her future growth and prosperity which could be made possible by the development of power and the irrigation of her lands.

8. Because of the misleading language in the bill which, whilst declaring that a large irrigation project in California shall bear the cost of the canal and of appurtenant structures (sec. 1, p. 2, lines 13 to 17; sec. 9, p. 16) necessary to irrigate the lands in California, the provisions of the bill, in truth and in fact, will require the power resources of Arizona and Nevada to underwrite the repayment of the cost "of the main canal and appurtenant structures connecting Laguna Dam with the Imperial and Coachella Valleys in California," including operation and maintenance charges (sec. 2; also lines 13 to 17, p. 2, of the bill).

9. Because the amount of water apportioned to California (sec. 5, p. 7) is not warranted in equity, law, justice, or morals.

10. Because the bill provides that when the canals, power plants, and structures in California are paid for they be turned over and delivered to the districts which use them in that State. (Sec. 7, p. 12.) But the bill does not provide that the dam and power plants be turned over to or inure to the benefit of the States of Arizona and Nevada when the Government is repaid. (Sec. 5, p. 7, line 16.)

11. Because the bill provides that the Imperial Irrigation District and other California districts may be given rights in the Laguna Dam which they do not now possess and which are the property of the Yuma County Water Users' Association, for which the Secretary of the Interior is acting as trustee, and an arbitrary action by the Secretary as authorized under this bill (sec. 7, p. 12; sec. 10, p. 18) would force the Yuma County Water Users' Association to engage in costly litigation to protect its interests.

12. Because the bill proposes to authorize the Federal Government to become a party to a conspiracy to impose a boycott upon Arizona and to enforce against her the terms of the Colorado River compact, when approved by six States, as it affects the upper basin States (sec. 12 (a), p. 19, and particularly 12 (c), p. 20) and to impose upon Arizona the conditions of a subsidiary compact to be made by two States (sec. 8 (b), p. 14), affecting the lower basin, and to enforce these compacts against Arizona under terms of the bill (sec. 12 (c), p. 20).

13. Because the bill authorizes the expenditure of $50,000,000 of Federal funds to irrigate lands owned largely by private land speculators in California in units in excess of 160 acres. The records show that of the 785,400 acres of land in Imperial Valley, one corporation alone owns 47,000 acres of these lands and only 167,100 acres are Government lands. (S. Doc. 142, 67th Cong., 2d sess., p. 80.) This report was made in 1922, and the Government acreage has probably decreased since that time.

14. Because the bill authorizes California, which comprises only 2½ per cent of the Colorado River Basin and contributes no water, to appropriate (sec. 5, p. 7, lines 4 to 13) over 38 per cent of the estimated constant water supply available in the main Colorado River for all seven States in the basin and for Mexico. (House hearings on H. R. 2903, p. 841, sec. 19, report of Herman Stabler; also Senate hearings on S. 320, December 19, 1925, p. 533, E. C. LaRue; also S. Doc. No. 142, 67th Cong., 2d sess., p. 37, table and text; also Water Supply Paper No. 556, U. S. Geological Survey, 1925, p. 122.)

15. Because the bill fails to provide for a review and approval of the plans of the project by engineers of large ability and experience as to the adequacy of the plans and specifications and the safety of the proposed dam.

There is no remorse so deep, so poignant, and so inveterate as that which will come when we shall some day realize that we omitted to avail ourselves of the opportunity to see to it that as far as science may do so, it has secured the safety of this dam. Fortune, success, and opportunity soar aloft on high and rapid wing and must be seized as they pass by. It is difficult, if not impossible, to overtake them once they have left us behind or found us asleep or afraid. However, if the dam is to be constructed, it is not yet too late to guarantee its safety.

TITLE II

STATES ARE ENTITLED TO EQUALITY OF RIGHT UNDER THE CONSTITUTION

The United States Supreme Court has declared that "One cardinal rule underlying all the relations of the States to each other is that of equality of right. Each State stands on the same level with all the rest. It can impose its own legislation on no one of the others and is bound to yield its own views to none." (Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 48, 97.)

In another case the court stated: "It [a State] finds itself in possession of what all admit to be a great public good and what it has it may keep and give no one reason for its will." (Hudson Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U. S. 356.)

The latter may be the legal and constitutional right of the State of Arizona, but it is not the policy of the State or of its representatives in offering opposition to the Boulder Canyon project legislation.

Arizona's demand is merely for equality of right with the other States. But Arizona denies the right of other States to impose their will upon her.

The representatives of the State of Arizona recognize that the Colorado River is an interstate and international stream. The water in the river originates wholly in the United States, but the mouth of the river is in a foreign country. The representatives of the State of Arizona recognize that the strict application of the doctrine laid down by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Wyoming v. Colorado (259 U. S. 419) would probably result in the appropriation of the water of the river by the States best able to put it to immediate use and that this would be extremely detrimental to the interests of the upper-basin States, and it would also probably inspire a race for competitive development of agricultural lands which economic conditions do not warrant.

The representatives of Arizona have stated repeatedly that they are willing to accept and enter into a compact with the other States in the Colorado River Basin, provided the State of Arizona is given the protection under the new laws equal to that which is given to all the other States. Or, stated in another way, Arizona is asking that if the law of prior appropriation is to be set aside and water is to be apportioned by a compact among the States, that Arizona be given the same protection against Mexico and California that Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, and New Mexico are asking for themselves. Arizona's claims are set out in detail elsewhere in this report.

TITLE III

BOULDER DAM IS PRIMARILY FOR POWER

The dam authorized by this bill is primarily for the purpose of obtaining a water power to lease to States, subdivisions of States, or to private individuals (sec. 5, p. 6), and thereby make available certain incidental benefits. In substantiation of this statement, I call attention to the substance of the following provisions of the bill:

1. No dam shall be constructed and no work be performed unless power revenues are adequate to pay for the interest and amortization and the operation and maintenance of the entire project. (Sec. 4 (b), p. 5.)

2. No charges are to be made for the storage, use, or delivery of water for domestic purposes. (Sec. 1, p. 2, lines 15 to 17.)

3. No charges are to be made for the storage, use or delivery of water for agricultural purposes. (Sec. 1, p. 2, lines 15 to 17.)

4. Priorities to the use of water from the reservoir shall be in the following order:

(a) Water for use of lands under "a canal connecting Laguna Dam with Imperial and Coachella Valleys." (Sec. 1, p. 2, lines 10 to 13.)

(b) Domestic use.

(c) Agricultural use.

(d) Power.

(e) Navigation.

Sections 4 (a), 5, 6, 8 (b), 12, and 14 of the act and Article IV of the Colorado River compact. (See especially sec. 12 (b) of the bill.)

5. If there be any surplus revenues, Nevada and Arizona are each to receive 18¾ per cent of such excess revenues. (Sec. 4, p. 5.)

6. Leases on power are not to be for longer than 50 years. (Sec. 5 (a), p. 7.)

7. Preference to the use of power is given to States, subdivisions of States, and private agencies in the order given. (Sec. 5 (c), p. 9.)

8. Any agency making a contract for 100,000 horsepower is required to reserve one-fourth of its transmission line for the use of other power contractees. (Sec. 5 (d), p. 10.)

The legislative fiction that one of the primary purposes of the bill is to "improve navigation," is destroyed by the provisions of the bill itself (sec. 16 (b), p. 20), which approves the Colorado River compact which if applied would make this provision of the bill read:

"The rights of the United States in or to waters of the Colorado River and its tributaries * * * for navigation * * * shall be subject to and controlled by the said Colorado River compact, which declares (art. 4) 'inasmuch as the Colorado River has ceased to be navigable for commerce and the reservation of its waters for navigation would seriously limit the development of its basin, the use of its waters for purposes of navigation shall be subservient to the uses of such waters for domestic, agricultural, and power purposes.'"

But, says the majority report (p. 9): "with its flow unregulated, the river can not be successfully used as a highway for commerce; in its regulated form it will provide a safe and dependable flow below the dam that can be used by power boats and other small craft. The reservoir created by the dam will be the largest artificial lake in the United States and capable of successful navigation."

To summarize: The bill provides there shall be no dam unless the power revenues are adequate to repay the Government; there shall be no charge for the use of water for domestic, or agricultural purposes; water shall be used, first for domestic use and agricultural purposes, next for power, and then if these agencies do not divert all of the water and thereby dry up the stream, it may be navigated by motor boats.

TITLE IV

"IMPROVING NAVIGATION" ON COLORADO RIVER IS LEGISLATIVE FICTION

The committee inserted on lines 3 and 4 on page 1 and on line 8 on page 11 the words "improving navigation." These words do not appear in the original bill. The purpose for inserting them was an endeavor to circumvent the Constitution of the United States.

To assert that the primary purpose of this bill is to improve navigation is ridiculous. The purpose of inserting this language is to attempt to have the Congress authorize this legislation under its authority "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with Indian tribes." (Art. 1, sec. 8, par. 3.)

There is testimony in the hearings of both the House and the Senate that the Colorado River, in its natural state, was a navigable stream from its mouth to a point above the proposed site for the Black Canyon, or Boulder Canyon Dam; but, there is also uncontradicted evidence in the hearings that the Colorado River from its mouth to the site of the proposed dam is not now used for navigation, and there is not on file or in the records a single petition, request, or demand that the Colorado River be improved for the purposes of navigation. On the contrary, the petitions and requests in the hearings and before Congress are for legislation to enable the States further to deplete the flow of the Colorado River and thereby render it wholly nonnavigable.

The bill authorizes the approval of the Colorado River compact, which in article 4 A provides:

"A. Inasmuch as the Colorado River has ceased to be navigable for commerce and the reservation of its waters for navigation would seriously limit the development of its basin, the use of its waters for purposes of navigation shall be subservient to the uses of such water for domestic, agricultural, and power purposes."

There is no evidence in the record that if the river were made navigable, there would be a single ton of freight carried on the river as the result of such an improvement.

TITLE V

TREATY OBLIGATIONS DO NOT REQUIRE THE ENACTMENT OF THIS LEGISLATION

International questions do not give authority to Congress to pass this bill.

Unless the United States negotiates a treaty with Mexico in which the United States binds itself to assume some degree of control and management of the river, it would have no authority to pass this legislation under the assumption that it was to carry out treaty obligations. There are no treaty obligations at this time, the fulfillment of which, require the passage of this legislation. In the absence of such obligations, this legislation can not be predicated upon that authority. There is now no treaty, compact, or agreement requiring the United States to send any of the waters of the Colorado River into Mexico, and all the waters of that river which Mexico now receives are allowed to go into Mexico purely as an act of grace.

TITLE VI

THE COLORADO RIVER COMPACT

The Congress may not impose a compact upon the States

There is no precedent for a bill such as we are now considering, and as was stated by Mr. John L. Gust (hearings on S. 728, p. 105):

"If such a bill as the Swing-Johnson bill had been introduced into Congress in the early years of our constitutional history, it would have rocked the very foundation of the Union. If it were offered to-day against one of the old and powerful States, it would create considerable commotion even to-day. The fact that it is directed against a young and weak State makes it dangerous. If the principles upon which it is based should become established, Congress could force any State into any kind of compact with another State or with a foreign power—because the power of making compacts is just as broad with respect to foreign powers as it is with States with respect to each other—by providing that until such compact was approved each State should receive no Federal aid for road construction, no forest-reserve funds for roads or schools, no money for harbor improvement, no public buildings, and no water from its own streams. That is the extent to which this bill goes, if I read it aright, and I think I am not mistaken as to its provisions, and I feel confident that such broad powers as that do not exist in Congress under the Constitution under which this Nation exists."

Congress can not impose a compact or the terms thereof upon the States. In Article I, section 10, of the Constitution of the United States, among other provisions, there occurs the following language:

"No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation * * *. No State shall without the consent of Congress * * * enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power * * *."

This provision of the Constitution makes it clear that the power in the States to make agreements or compacts not having been delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States is reserved to the States, with the single restriction that the consent of Congress is necessary to the validation thereof.

It therefore must necessarily follow that the Congress can not impose upon a State or States the terms of a compact to which said State or States refuse to give consent. It must also necessarily follow that Congress can not authorize "two" or "six" (sec. 8 (b) and sec. 12 of the bill) States to confederate and enter into an alliance and to apportion among themselves natural resources which are the common heritage of seven States and to do it over the objections of the protesting State or States.

This bill (secs. 4 A, 5, 6, 8 A and B, 12 A, B, C, D, and 14) binds this legislation to the provisions of the Colorado River compact.

The bill is an attempt to apportion water, as it approves the Colorado River compact (secs. 4 A and 12), which is a proposed agreement which, if approved by the seven States, parties to it and with the approval of Congress, would repeal the water laws in the Colorado River Basin as they now exist and are defined by the United States Supreme Court. The compact proposes to substitute for the water laws based upon prior appropriation and beneficial use, the allotment of a definite quantity of water to the "upper basin" and "lower basin" States.

The authority to make such a compact rests in the States, and not in the Congress. The States have not ratified the compact; therefore it is not a valid agreement.

This bill attempts to rivet the provisions of the compact onto the seven States. The bill goes further and authorizes the State of California to appropriate and consume a large proportion—estimated to be 38 per cent—of the water available for use in the Colorado River above Laguna Dam. (Sec. 5, p. 7, lines 4 to 12, inclusive.) And it authorizes two States to make a compact to bind three States. (P. 14, line 18.) I deny that the right exists in Congress to apportion this water.

Any attempt on the part of "six States" so far as their actions relate to the entire basin or of "two States," so far as their actions relate to the "lower basin," even with the consent of Congress, to enter into an alliance or confederation to deprive a seventh State of the right to utilize and enjoy the benefits of its natural resources is equivalent to a conspiracy. The States only can make a compact and divide the water; Congress can not do it for them. In this connection I again quote John L. Gust (Hearings on S. 728, p. 121):

"In our opinion the Colorado River compact if executed by six but not by seven States will be wholly void for the following reasons:

"First. Considered as a contract, it is legally impossible of performance when made.

"Second. Considered as a contract, it is illegal because it is a plain attempt on the part of the States that are parties to the agreement to control the property and resources of another State for their own benefit.

"Considering the proposition first above stated, it is a principle of the law of contracts that contracts impossible of performance when made are void. The Colorado River compact purports to divide the water of the river between an upper basin and a lower basin which are both included within the boundaries of seven States. Each of those States has a right in the waters of the river. This is established by Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S. 46) and Wyoming v. Colorado (259 U. S. 419).

"One of the States having a large interest in such waters declines to enter into the compact. Thereupon the remaining six purport to execute the compact and carry it out exactly as written for the seven.

"In other words these six purport to apportion the water just as it was proposed to be apportioned by the act of the seven.

"This means that the six undertake to divide the water among the seven without the consent of the seventh. Manifestly this can not be legally done. Arizona can not be bound without its consent, and if Arizona is not bound the agreement simply will not work. The six States are undertaking to do something wholly beyond their power.

"Considering the second proposition, it seems plain that any attempted agreement on the part of six States to parcel out the property and rights and prerogatives of seven States without the consent of the seventh State is necessarily illegal. Can the law recognize and uphold an agreement in which certain States undertake to dispose of the property and rights and prerogatives of another State to suit their own pleasure and for their own profit and against the will of the other State? It can not be said that the six-State compact does not undertake to dispose of Arizona's property rights. By its express terms it applies to the property rights of Arizona as well as to the property rights of the other States.

"Moreover, the California resolution adopting the six-State compact declares it shall not become binding on California until Arizona is subjected to the compact by the power of the United States. Said resolution is a proposition by the State of California to enter into a conspiracy with the United States for the purpose of depriving Arizona of her constitutional rights."

In connection with this proposal that Congress shall usurp authority, I direct attention to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Should Congress under the pretext of executing its powers pass laws for the accomplishments of objects not intrusted to the Government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such decision come before it, to say that such an act was not the law of the land. (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 423.)

PRESENT STATUS AND WHAT THE STATES ARE CONTENDING FOR WITH REFERENCE TO THE COLORADO RIVER COMPACT

The States of Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico have ratified and desire ratification of the compact by all seven States. This compact will reserve for the present and future requirements of the upper basin States the water allocated for their use by the Colorado River compact.

"Resolved, That it is firm belief of the representatives of the four said upper basin States, as assembled at Denver, Colo., this 19th day of December, 1927, that no legislation proposing the construction of any project upon the Colorado River should be enacted by Congress or otherwise authorized by any Federal agency before the negotiations now in progress have been completed and every reasonable effort exhausted to reach such agreement between the seven States.

"W. H. Adams, Governor of Colorado; George H. Dern, Governor of Utah; Frank C. Emerson, Governor of Wyoming; Edward Sargent, Lieutenant Governor of New Mexico; Delph E. Carpenter, interstate river commissioner for Colorado; William L. Boatright, attorney general of Colorado; Francis C. Wilson, interstate river commissioner for New Mexico; L. Ward Bannister, counsel for the city of Denver; M. C. Mechem, representing New Mexico." (Senate hearings on S. 728 and S. 1274, p. 132.)

Utah: The State of Utah, speaking through its governor (hearings on S. 728, p. 143), defined the demands of that State to be as follows:

"1. Seven-State ratification of the Santa Fe compact.

"2. A treaty with Mexico preserving to the United States the right to any water of the Colorado River made available through development in the United States, including equitable rights to the natural flow.

"3. Acknowledgment that water within the State is the property of the State.

"4. Acknowledgment that the State of Utah is the owner of that portion of the bed of the Colorado River which lies within its borders.

"5. Full acknowledgment that the States have a right to and receive compensation for the use of their lands and waters."

The qualified ratification of the Santa Fe compact, as adopted by the Legislature of Utah, January 26, 1927, was as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Utah:

"SECTION 1. Colorado River in Utah and Green River in Utah declared to be navigable streams: That the State of Utah does hereby declare that the Colorado River in Utah and the Green River in Utah from time immemorial and at the time of the admission of Utah into the Union as one of the States of the United States of America were and ever since have been and now are navigable streams.

"SEC. 2. Title to bed of all navigable rivers vested in State of Utah, when—Exceptions: That the title to the beds of said rivers and of each of them, as well as the title to the beds of all other streams and lakes which at the time of said admission of Utah into the Union were navigable in fact, vested in the State of Utah at the time of its said admission into the Union and said title has at all times thereafter been and now is vested in the State of Utah, except such portion or portions thereof as may have been heretofore disposed of by the State of Utah pursuant to law by express grant.

"SEC. 3. Intent with respect to paragraph (a) of Article IV, of the Colorado River compact—Colorado River navigable for intrastate commerce: That the State of Utah does hereby declare that its adherence to paragraph (a) of Article IV of the Colorado River compact as set forth in chapter 5, Laws of Utah, 1923, which paragraph reads as follows:

"(a) Inasmuch as the Colorado River has ceased to be navigable for commerce and the reservation of its waters for navigation would seriously limit the development of its basin, the use of its waters for purposes of navigation shall be subservient to the uses of such waters for domestic, agricultural, and power purposes. If the Congress shall not consent to this paragraph, the other provisions of this compact shall nevertheless remain binding." (Hearings on S. 728, p. 170.)

Nevada: The State of Nevada desires ratification of the Colorado River compact by the seven States and a supplementary compact which will recognize the right of that State to the use of 300,000 acre-feet of water (Senate hearings on S. 728 and S. 1274, p. 170) and the acceptance of the principles of the Pittman resolution, which is found on page 131 of the 1928 Senate hearings on S. 728.

Resolution offered by Senator KEY PITTMAN on behalf of the Nevada Commission to the Conference of Governors and the Commissioners of the Colorado Basin States in session at Denver, Colo. Adopted at Seven States' Conference on the Colorado River at Denver, October 4, 1927, by affirmative votes of Arizona, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming—California not voting.

"Whereas it is the settled law of this country that the ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by navigable waters within the limits of the several States of the Union belong to the respective States within which they are found, with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof, when that can be done without substantial impairment of the interests of the public in the waters, and subject always to the paramount right of Congress to control the navigation so far as may be necessary for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the States; and

"Whereas it is the settled law of this country that subject to the settlement of controversies between them by interstate compact, or decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and subject always to the paramount right of Congress to control the navigation of navigable streams so far as may be necessary for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the States, the exclusive sovereignty over all of the waters within the limits of the several States belongs to the respective States within which they are found, and the sovereignty over waters constituting the boundary between two States is equal in each of such respective States; and

"Whereas it is the sense of this conference that the exercise by the United States Government of the delegated constitutional authority to control navigation for the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce does not confer upon such Government the use of waters for any other purposes which are not plainly adapted to that end, and does not divest the States of their sovereignty over such waters for any other public purpose that will not interfere with navigation: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this conference of governors and the duly authorized and appointed commissioners of the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, New Mexico, Nevada, Utah, and Wyoming, constituting the Colorado River Basin States, assembled at Denver, Colo., this 23d day of September, 1927, that—

"The rights of the States under such settled law shall be maintained.

"The States have a legal right to demand and receive compensation for the use of their lands and waters except from the United States for the use of such lands and waters to regulate interstate and foreign commerce.

"The State or States upon whose land a dam and reservoir is built by the United States Government, or whose waters are used in connection with a dam built by the United States Government to generate hydroelectric energy are entitled to the preferred right to acquire the hydroelectric energy so generated or to acquire the use of such dam and reservoir for the generation of hydroelectric energy upon undertaking to pay to the United States Government the charges that may be made for such hydroelectric energy or for the use of such dam and reservoir to amortize the Government investment, together with interest thereon, or in lieu thereof to agree upon any other method of compensation for the use of their waters."

All the interested States agree that, if the compact is approved, Nevada shall be granted the right to take such water as may be beneficially used in that State, which is estimated to be 300,000 acre-feet.

California: The demands of California and her policy concerning the compact are outlined in chapter 33, assembly Joint Resolution No. 15, adopted by the Legislature of California in 1925. This resolution ratifies the Colorado River compact with the following provisos:

"Provided, however, That the said Colorado River compact shall not be binding or obligatory upon the State of California, by this or any former approval thereof, or in any event until the President of the United States shall certify and declare—

"(a) That the Congress of the United States has duly authorized and directed the construction by the United States of a dam in the main stream of the Colorado River at or below Boulder Canyon, and to create a storage reservoir of a capacity of not less than 20,000,000 acre-feet of water; and

"(b) That the Congress of the United States has exercised the power and jurisdiction of the United States to make the terms of the said Colorado River compact binding and effective as to the water of the Colorado River.

This bill meets and conforms to the full demands of California.

With reference to an allocation of the water available under the Colorado River compact for use in the "lower basin," California demanded as an "irreducible minimum" 4,600,000 acre-feet of the allocated water and one-half of any surplus water unallocated by that compact, available for use in the main stream. (Testimony Charles L. Childers, Senate hearings on S. 728.)

Arizona: The Colorado River Commission of Arizona defined the position of Arizona with reference to the Colorado River compact to be as follows (Hearings on S. 728, pp. 19, 46):

"(1) Arizona will accept the Santa Fe compact if and when supplemented by a subsidiary compact which will make definite and certain the protection of Arizona's interests, as follows:

"(2) That before regulation of the Colorado River is undertaken, Mexico be formally notified that the United States Government reserves for use in the United States all water made available by storage in the United States.

"(3) That any compact dividing the water of the Colorado River and its tributaries shall not impair the rights of the States, under the respective water laws, to control the appropriation of water within their boundaries.

"(4) That the waters of the streams tributary to the Colorado River below Lees Ferry and which are inadequate to develop the irrigable lands of their own valleys be reserved to the States in which they are located.

"(5) That so much of the water of the Colorado River as is physically available to the lower basin States—but without prejudice to the rights of the upper basin States—shall be legally available to and divided between Arizona, California, and Nevada, as follows:

"(a) To Nevada, 300,000 acre-feet per annum.

"(b) The remainder, after such deduction as may be made to care for Mexican lands allotted by treaty, shall be equally divided between Arizona and California.[1]

"(6)[2] That the right of the States to secure revenue from and to control the development of hydroelectric power within or upon their boundaries be recognized.

"(7)[2] That encouragement will be given, subject to the above conditions, to either public or private development of the Colorado River, at any site or sites harmonizing with a comprehensive plan for the maximum development of the river's irrigational and power resources.

"(8) That Arizona is prepared to enter in a compact at this time to settle all the questions enumerated herein, or Arizona will agree to forego a settlement of items 6 and 7, and make a compact dividing the water alone, provided it is specified in such compact that no power plants shall be installed in the lower basin portion of the main Colorado River until the power question is settled by a power compact among the States.[3]"

CONTROL OF WATER BY WESTERN STATES IS RECOGNIZED BY CONGRESS

In admitting the Western States into the Union "on an equality with all the other States," Congress has conceded that no constitutional right was vested in the Federal Government to retain jurisdiction over appropriations of water for irrigation, domestic, power, or other uses excepting as they might affect navigation. In fact, the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Boquillas Cattle

[1] With reference to par. 5 (b) of the Arizona statement, Arizona agreed to accept a proposal for a division of the water which was suggested by the Governors of Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico, that the water available for the use of the lower basin be divided approximately as follows (Senate hearings on S. 728, p. 349), each State to have its tributary waters before they enter the main stream: To Nevada, 300,000 acre-feet; to California, 4,200,000 acre-feet; to Arizona, 3,000,000 acre-feet. All available surplus water to be divided equally between Arizona and California.

[2] With reference to pars. (6) and (7), the Arizona representatives insist upon the acceptance of the principle of the Pittman resolution in a compact. (Senate hearings on S. 728 and S. 1274, p. 131.)

[3] The contention of Arizona, with reference to power revenues, stated briefly and succinctly, as it relates to the development proposed to be made under this act, is that the State expects to derive a revenue from the hydroelectric power developed on the project, equivalent to what it would receive in taxation, if the project was developed by private enterprise.

Co. v. Curtis (213 U. S. 339), in an opinion sustaining a decision of the Territorial Supreme Court of Arizona, declared "the doctrine of appropriation" was in force in Arizona before it was annexed to the United States.

The Congress of the United States first recognized the necessity for local customs to govern the use and appropriation of water in the semiarid Western States when it adopted section 9 of the act of July 26, 1866 (14 Stat. 266; sec. 2399, Rev. Stats.). This section reads:

"That whenever, by priority of possession, right to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes, have vested and accrued and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of the courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same; and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals, for the purposes aforesaid, is hereby acknowledged and confirmed."

Under the terms of both the United States reclamation law and of the Federal water power act, the United States is required to obtain the consent of the States to use the lands and waters of the States before it can proceed with the erection of any dam for the purposes of utilizing the water for domestic, irrigation, or power purposes.

Section 8 of the United States reclamation act, Thirty-second Statutes, page 388 (1902), reads:

"That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or any vested right acquired thereunder, and the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall proceed in conformity with such laws, and nothing herein shall in any way affect any right of any State or of the Federal Government or of any landowner, appropriator, or user of water in, to, or from any interstate stream of the waters thereof: Provided, That the right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right."

The Federal water power act, approved June 10, 1920, provides in section 17 thereof as follows:

"That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or in any way to interfere with the laws of the respective States relating to control, appropriation, or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses, or any vested right acquired therein."

POWER OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OVER DEVELOPMENT AND USE OF WATER POWER

Under this title there will be found in the 1928 Senate hearing on this bill, beginning on page 465, a report made some years ago by Senators Nelson, Root, Chilton, O'Gorman, and Culberson, as a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. The report deals with the power of the Federal Government over the development and use of water power within the respective States. I quote from their report (p. 466):

"TITLE OF THE STATES IN THE BEDS AND WATERS OF NAVIGABLE STREAMS

"The several States of the Union are each primarily the proprietors of, and have the sovereignty over, the beds and waters of the navigable streams and watercourses within their respective borders, subject only to the rights of the Federal Government under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution (par. 3, sec. 8, Art. I) and to the rights of the Federal Government as owner of the riparian lands (par. 2, sec. 3, Art. IV), which rights will hereafter be referred to and enlarged upon.

"In the case of Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet. 367), where the question of tidelands and tidewaters was involved, the Supreme Court of the United States makes this clear and comprehensive declaration:

"'For when the Revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign, and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters, and the soils under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the General Government.'

"The same doctrine was laid down by the court in the case of Pollard v. Hagan (3 How. 212), and it was held to apply to the newer States in as full a measure as to the original States of the Union. In this case the court concludes its opinion as follows:

"'By the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: First. The shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the States respectively. Second. The new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States. Third. The right of the United States to the public land and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the land (tidewater land) in controversy.'

"In the case of Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S. 324), Justice Bradley declares that the correct principles were laid down in the foregoing cases, and then adds:

"'These cases related to tidewater, it is true; but they enunciate principles which are equally applicable to all navigable waters.'

"The rule laid down in the foregoing cases is reaffirmed and amplified with the citation of numerous authorities in the case of Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S. 1)."

The States of Arizona and Nevada have never recognized the common-law rule of riparian rights. Their actions in this respect were concurred in and approved by Congress as they come within the scope of general legislation on the appropriation of water (acts of 1866 and 1870; now sections 2339 and 2340 of the Revised Statutes) and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in a long line of decisions.

WATER LAWS OF WESTERN STATES

Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights says (p. 331):

"In the following States the common-law rule of riparian rights is rejected in toto: Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Nevada, Utah, and Wyoming. As the ownership of the beds of fresh-water streams navigable in fact is one of the riparian rights, it follows that this right was also rejected and the ownership of the beds of these streams is in the States under whose jurisdiction these waters flow."

No State in the Colorado River Basin, with the exception of California, either in its capacity as a Territory or as a State, has ever recognized the common-law rule of riparian rights. California has never recognized the riparian doctrine as it relates to that portion of the State bordering upon the Colorado River. The laws of the several States will be found beginning on page 476 of the Senate hearings on S. 728 and S. 1274. The provisions of the constitutions of the several States relating to the appropriation and use of water, together with court decisions sustaining them, are as follows:

"Arizona: The common-law doctrine of riparian water rights shall not obtain or be of any force or effect in the State. (Art. XVII, sec. 1.) All existing rights to the use of any of the waters in the State for all useful or beneficial purposes are hereby recognized and confirmed. (Art. XVII, sec. 2.) (Boquillas Cattle Co. v. Curtis, 213 U. S. 564; Clough v. Wing, 2 Ariz. 371.)

"New Mexico: The unappropriated water of every natural stream, perennial or torrential, within the State of New Mexico, is hereby declared to belong to the public and subject to appropriation for beneficial use. In accordance with the laws of the State, priority of appropriation shall give the better right. (Sec. 2, Art. XVI.) (Trombley v. Luterman, 6 N. Mex. 15.)

"Wyoming: Water being essential to industrial prosperity, of limited amount, and easy of diversion from its natural channel, its control must be in the State, which, in providing for its use, shall equally guard all the various interests involved. (Art. I, sec. 31.)

"The waters of all natural streams, springs, lakes, and other collections of still waters within the boundaries of the State are hereby declared to be the property of the State. (Art. VIII, sec. 1.) (S. 728 and S. 1274, p. 482.) (Farm Investment Co. v. Carpenter, 9 Wyo. 110.)

"Colorado: The waters of every natural stream not heretofore appropriated within the State of Colorado is hereby declared to be the property of the public and the same is dedicated to the use of the people of the State, subject to appropriation as hereinafter provided. (Art. XIV, sec. 5.) (S. 728 and S. 1274, p. 484.) (Yernker v. Nichols, 1 Colo. 151; Coffin v. Left Hand Ditch Co., 6 Colo. 443.)

"California: The use of all water now appropriated or that may hereafter be appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use and subject to the regulations and control of the State in the manner to be prescribed by law. (Art. XIV, sec. 1.) (S. 728 and S. 1274, p. 476.)

"Utah: All existing rights to the use of any of the waters of this State for any useful or beneficial purposes are hereby recognized and confirmed. (Art. XVII, sec. 1.) (S. 728 and S. 1274, p. 481.) (State v. Xalio (4575), Nov. 25, 1927; Stowell v. Johnson, 7 Utah, 215; 26 Pac. 290.)

"Nevada: All natural watercourses and natural lakes and the waters thereof which are not held in private ownership belong to the State and are subject to appropriation for beneficial uses. (Reno Smelting, Milling & Reduction Works v. Stevenson, 20 Nev. 269, 21 Pac. 317, 4 L. R. A. 60, 19 Com. St. Rep. 364.)"

This section is quoted from the State Water Code of Nevada. The constitution of the State is silent upon the use of public water.

A declaration contained in the bill of rights adopted by the Territory of Arizona in 1864—which was two years in advance of the law passed by Congress in July, 1866—recognized that local customs and laws, in addition to the decisions of the courts in the semiarid States of the West, should govern the appropriation and use of water. The section of the Territorial act follows:

"All streams, lakes, and ponds of water capable of being used for the purpose of navigation or irrigation are hereby declared to be public property, and no individual or corporation shall have the right to appropriate them exclusively to their own private use, except under such equitable regulations and restrictions as the legislature shall provide for that purpose."

A GRAVE MENACE TO TAMPER WITH WATER LAWS

There is a long line of decisions by the courts sustaining this principle, and any attempt by Congress to destroy, directly or indirectly, by subterfuge or by law, the basic and fundamental principles which underlie these provisions of the constitutions and laws of the Western States is fraught with grave danger to them. These principles governing the use of water are founded upon the natural law and should not be disturbed by Congress.

The State of Idaho has provisions in its constitution practically identical with those of the States in the Colorado River Basin and does not recognize the riparian doctrine.

The States of Montana, Oregon, Washington, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Texas have revised their constitutions and laws so that they now accept and enforce the "Doctrine of appropriation and use" of water as distinguished from the riparian doctrine.

The laws and conditions in all of these States will be menaced by any precedents which may be established by the pending legislation.

WATER RIGHTS WERE NEVER RELINQUISHED BY STATES

These principles and rights have never been relinquished by the States to the Federal Government. Gov. George H. Dern, of Utah, in testifying before the Senate Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation (hearings on S. 728, p. 144), stated the situation very forcefully and the menace which would come to the States from tinkering with the water laws of the States by Congress:

"Governor DERN. Congress also recognized the sovereignty of the States over their waters in the Federal water power act, for that act provides that the United States Government shall not grant any permit to use the public lands for the building of a power dam until the applicant has first obtained a permit from the State wherein the dam is to be built, to use its waters and land and has otherwise complied with the laws of the State. The Representatives and Senators from the Western States have always been extremely jealous of the sovereign rights of the States in their waters, and up to this time they have impressed that principle upon every piece of Federal legislation affecting the waters of western streams. It is to be hoped that those in the present Congress will be equally vigilant.

"The pending bills propose an entirely new and revolutionary national policy, and completely reverse the former position of Congress with respect to the waters of western streams. Never before has Congress gone so far as to attempt to appropriate water without the consent of a State. The West has always heretofore seen to it that its sovereign rights were respected.

"Every State has the inherent sovereign right to control the uses of water, which is essential to its existence. To deprive a State of this right would be to destroy its autonomy. Moreover, the original States are conceded by everybody to possess full power to control their waters, save for the regulation of interstate commerce, and to deprive the newer States of this control would take from them that equality with the original States which was guaranteed them when they were admitted into the Union. The arid States in particular, whose water is their very lifeblood, should realize that if they would protect their autonomy they must resist the deliberate and constant pressure of certain enthusiasts for Federal usurpation of State powers."

THE REAL PURPOSE OF THE COLORADO RIVER COMPACT

A full and complete discussion of the history of the compact and the conditions which led up to its negotiation will be found in the 1926 House hearings on the Swing bills (H. R. 6251, 9826), beginning on page 146, in the testimony of Mr. Delph Carpenter, of Colorado.

The real purpose of the Colorado River compact, which is referred to in six sections of this bill (4 (a), 5, 6, 8 (a), 8 (b), 12 (a), 12 (b), 1 (c), 12 (d), and 14), is primarily to conserve for the upper basin States the right to use water which originates in those States. Those States want to retain the water for use in the future.

On page 710 of the Senate hearings on December 15, 1925, on S. 320, is found the following testimony:

"Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. Carpenter, I am not sure whether I understood the full inference about the delay in the development of the lands in the upper basin States. Did you intend to say to the committee in answer to Senator JOHNSON'S question that the ultimate development in these upper basin States would be delayed for 50 or 100 or possibly 200 years?

"Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, sir."

It will therefore be observed that the water is not being reserved to the upper basin States for immediate use. Arizona has not asked that she be accorded the same degree of protection as that accorded the upper basin States, although she is entitled to it. Arizona will have exhausted all the water available for her use long before the upper basin States utilize the water allocated to them. We do demand a measure of protection which will conserve our interests and such protection is not given us by either the compact or by this bill.

This bill (sections 4 (a), 8 (b), and 12) approves the Colorado River compact. That compact allocates annually 7,500,000 acre-feet of water in perpetuity to the upper basin States and retains to them an equity in the undivided surplus.

TITLE VII

THE AVAILABLE WATER SUPPLY IS INADEQUATE FOR ALL

In considering this bill and the Colorado River compact, it is important that we know approximately how much water will be available for the use of the States. The United States Geological Survey is the Government bureau authorized by Congress to study water resources. Mr. E. C. La Rue testified:

"The figures here presented therefore indicate that complete utilization and control of the stream of waters in the upper basin will create a shortage of about 3,800,000 acre-feet in the supply available for the lower basin. More complete data would probably indicate a greater shortage in the water supply available for the irrigation of lands on the lower Colorado. Evidently the flow of the Colorado River and its tributaries is not sufficient to irrigate all the irrigable lands lying within the basin.

"From these estimates it appears that when ultimate irrigation development is reached in the upper basin of the Colorado River there will be a natural shortage of 5,000,000 acre-feet in the lower basin, an amount sufficient to irrigate 1,100,000 acres of land. (Senate hearings on S. 320, December 9, 1925, p. 533.)

"Mr. LA RUE. I might add here that if we consider the 20-year period of low flow, 1886 to 1905, inclusive, we will find that should such a period of drought occur again the water available at Parker, Ariz., would be about 6,570,000 acre-feet annually, the amount required for the needs of the lower basin being 14,714,000 acre-feet. The annual shortage would be 8,145,000 acre-feet. During such a 20-year period there would be less than half enough water to supply the needs of the lower basin. (S. 320, December 9, 1925, p. 533.)

"Mr. LA RUE. If you will agree that we will irrigate 1,000,000 acres in Mexico and let 1,000,000 acres in the United States remain dry, then go ahead and build the Boulder Canyon Dam." (Senate hearings on S. 320, December 9, 1925, p. 545.)

Mr. Herman Stabler, chief of the land classification branch of the United States Geological Survey, made a report from which the following is quoted:

"19. The estimates of water supply and practicable storage for the period 1878–1922 indicate that through long periods not to exceed 12,000,000 acre-feet of water a year may be relied on for future irrigation development above Laguna Dam and for present and future development below that point." (House hearings on H. R. 2903, March 25, 1924, p. 841.)

Mr. O. C. Merrill, executive secretary of the Federal Power Commission, testified as follows:

"It is the opinion of those who have investigated the water resources of the Colorado Basin that there at least is not any surplus of waters for the necessities of irrigation, and that therefore in any general scheme of development of the river care should be exercised not unnecessarily to waste waters which though not needed in this generation are almost certain to be needed in the future." (Senate hearings on S. 320, December 8, 1925, p. 505.)

Col. William Kelly, former chief engineer of the Federal Power Commission, testified:

"Mr. LITTLE. Colonel, before we finish; do you think there is water enough in the Colorado River to irrigate it all?

"Colonel KELLY. There is reason to believe there is not.

"Mr. LITTLE. How much shy?

"Colonel KELLY. I can not say exactly how much is going to be shy, but I am satisfied that counting the lands that can be irrigated in Mexico there is not sufficient water to irrigate all the land.

"Mr. LITTLE. If we omit them there would be plenty of water, would there not?

"Colonel KELLY. There might be enough. There would be some short years." (House hearings on H. R. 2903, April 15, 1924, p. 1249.)

In the report "Problems of Imperial Valley and vicinity" (S. Doc. No. 142, 67th Cong., 2d sess.), on page 37, will be found a table which gives the average annual run-off for the years 1903 to 1920. The report makes an estimate of water available at Boulder Canyon of 16,470,000 acre-feet after allowing for past depletion. But the report admits that the table leaves out a cycle of years of low flow and drought immediately preceding it.

TITLE VIII

DEMANDS UPON THE AVAILABLE WATER SUPPLY

The States of the upper basin—Colorado, New Mexico, Wyoming, and Utah—have reserved for their perpetual use by the Colorado River Co. 7,500,000 acre-feet of water. This is a somewhat larger amount of water than any Federal official has estimated will be required for their use, but Arizona is willing to concede that much water to the upper basin for use at any time in the future. The evidence concerning the amount of water required for use in the upper basin States is as follows:

	Acre-feet
Col. William Kelly, chief engineer, Federal Power Commission (p. 1258, H. R. 2903, 1924)	6,500,000
E. C. La Rue, hydraulic engineer, U. S. Geological Survey (p. 111, Water Supply Paper No. 556, 1925)	5,815,000
A. P. Davis, director U. S. Reclamation Service (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Feb. —, 1923)	6,590,000

Engineers representing the several States of the upper basin have estimated a maximum diversion from the Colorado River and its tributaries in those States of 9,550,000. However, this does not represent the net consumptive use which, with a return flow of 25 per cent, would be 7,200,000 acre-feet.

According to a report made by F. C. Weymouth, chief engineer United States Reclamation Service in February, 1924, it is estimated that there will be available for diversion below Boulder Canyon 9,341,000 acre-feet of water each year. In 1925 the United States Geological Survey reported in Water Supply Paper No. 556 that 9,593,000 acre-feet will be available for irrigation below Boulder Canyon. Both of these figures are based upon estimates of the maximum possible uses of water in the upper basin. In calculating the amount of water which may be put to beneficial use in Nevada, California, Arizona, and Old Mexico after the flow of the Colorado River is completely regulated, it may be said that approximately 9,500,000 acre-feet will be available. It is reported that Mexico is now using about 1,000,000 acre-feet of water, which if conceded to that country by treaty, would leave about 8,500,000 acre-feet available for use in Arizona, Nevada, and California.

Mr. George W. Malone, State engineer of Nevada and secretary of the Colorado River Commission of that State, testified:

"Nevada has claimed 300,000 acre-feet of water to be used within her borders * * *. She could no doubt use more water than is claimed if allowed an unlimited period for development" * * *. (Senate hearings on S. 728 and S. 1274, January 19, 1928, p. 233.)

Mr. H. A. Van Norman, representing the city of Los Angeles, demanded on behalf of that city an amount of water to be pumped annually from the Colorado River Basin to the coastal plain of "1,500 second-feet," which would be 1,095,000 acre-feet. (Senate hearings on S. 728–1274, January 21, 1928, p. 292.)

Mr. Charles L. Childers testified and put in the record the water requirements of the State of California, which, in effect, demand annually 4,600,000 acre-feet of the allotted waters and one-half of any surplus waters in the river. (Senate hearings on S. 728–1274, January 21, 1928, p. 322.)

Prior to 1922 the State of Arizona had made no exhaustive surveys of the land possible of irrigation from the Colorado River. Arizona was busily engaged in developing land in the central portion of the State, upon her own streams, which are tributary of the Colorado.

A reconnaissance survey of Arizona lands was made under Federal Government auspices in 1923, and topographical surveys were begun in 1925, the field work for which was completed in the fall of 1927. These surveys indicate that there is far more land in Arizona, economically feasible of irrigation, than there is water to irrigate it.

Mr. E. C. La Rue, an engineer who was employed by the United States Geological Survey for 23 years, and who was the chairman of the Arizona Engineering Commission appointed by the United States Geological Survey to investigate the irrigational possibilities in Arizona from the Colorado River, offered one plan of development based upon a part gravity and part pump lift, with an estimated cost for power of 7½ mills. He testified (Senate hearings on S. 320, December 9, 1925, p. 564) that water could be delivered to this land at a cost of $168 an acre to over 800,000 acres of land in Arizona. Since that report was made further surveys and studies by engineers employed by Arizona indicate that water can be delivered to at least 1,250,000 acres of land at a cost much less than $168 an acre. With a duty of 4 acre-feet, at least 5,000,000 acre-feet of water must be diverted from the Colorado River to irrigate this Arizona land. (Senate hearings on S. 728, January 17, 1928, pp. 72–74.) But assuming, for the sake of argument only, that it would cost $168 an acre—which seems excessive, for one reason, because power for pumping will not cost 7½ mills—a comparison of this project is invited with the Columbia Basin project recently considered by the Congress.

The hearings on the Columbia Basin project brought out the fact that the cost of irrigating the lands of that project is estimated to be $158 per acre and that project is declared to be practical now.

As to the question of the relative feasibility of projects, your attention is again invited to the testimony of Mr. Carpenter, of Colorado, that it may be 200 years before the water which the upper basin States are asking to have reserved to them will be used in those States. (Senate hearings on S. 320, December 18, 1925, p. 710.)

TITLE IX

THE FLOOD MENACE DOES NOT REQUIRE EMERGENCY ACTION

While it is generally admitted that there is a menace to property values and to property as a result of the floods in the Colorado River, and that flood control is needed at a comparatively early date, the testimony of numerous witnesses is to the effect that development of the river should not be undertaken until a seven-State compact is ratified. In substantiation of this assertion I direct attention to the testimony of the following witnesses:

Governor Emerson, of Wyoming, one of the members of the special advisory board appointed by Secretary Work, testified as follows:

"Few realize the real magnitude of the great project that is proposed at Black or Boulder Canyon—a dam twice as high as any dam that has been constructed in the world heretofore; a reservoir seven or eight times the capacity of any reservoir that has been constructed heretofore. The magnitude of this project is so great that we should be sure we are right before we go ahead. There is no such urgency for relief from conditions applying to the physical situation upon the lower river as to warrant any course but to allow all reasonable time and effort for the completion of the seven-State agreement by the approval of all the seven States." (Senate hearings on S. 728, p. 206.)

Gov. George H. Dern, of Utah, chairman of the Colorado River conference, which was in session for many weeks at Denver, Colo., testified as follows:

"Governor DERN. The question of flood control, of course, is only one of the purposes of this bill. As a matter of fact, one might have sat through the Denver conference without discovering that there was any problem of flood control. It was hardly mentioned at Denver, and there did not seem to be much importance attached to it there. It seems to me that California, by the reservation that she put on her ratification, practically refused to accept flood control. She specifically refused to accept it except by means of one particular project that she herself had selected. It seems to me she practically estopped Congress from giving her flood control except through that one particular project, which Congress might conceivably have found to be unwise. Therefore it seems to me that California has not——

"Senator JOHNSON. How does that explain your answers here?

"Governor DERN (continuing). That California has not exhibited very deep concern over flood control."

(Senate hearings on S. 728, p. 174.)

In this connection your attention is directed to a map which was prepared by Mr. E. C. La Rue, an engineer, who was formerly in the employ of the United States Geological Survey. Mr. La Rue resigned his Government employment last summer, after over 20 years of service, and gave as his reason: "That he was muzzled by the Department of the Interior and forbidden to oppose the legislation proposed in the Swing-Johnson bill," which he has testified he believes to be unsound. The map is one of the studies made by Mr. La Rue in connection with his work and studies on the Colorado River. It indicates that if the entire flow of the Colorado River was turned into the Imperial Valley that it would require about a year and a half for the water level of the Salton Sea to rise as far as the town of Mecca; 12 years before it reached the highest town in the valley, and 15 years to get to sea level.

If the advocates of the Swing-Johnson bill had exercised energy and good judgment, Imperial Valley would to-day have been protected from floods of the Colorado River and the all-American canal would have been nearing completion; but, most unfortunately for Imperial Valley, the advocates of the Swing-Johnson bill have preferred to spend their time and energy in planning how most effectively to exploit Arizona's resources rather than to spend their time and energy in securing the relief which Congress would quickly and amply grant. Just so long as Imperial Valley continues to be beguiled by those urban Pollyannas who seek to acquire Arizona's potential hydroelectric energy, just so long will Imperial Valley be imperiled.

California seeks not flood control but hydroelectric power. Flood control may be the excuse, but power is the substance of the demand for this bill. Arizona has never stood in the way and does not now stand in the way of ample appropriations for flood control on the Colorado River. California has never been willing to have an engineering investigation made of the Colorado River under the terms of section 3 of the flood control act of March 1, 1917.

Politically, financially, industrially, socially, and economically California is one of the most powerful States of the Union, and if her congressional delegation had labored for Imperial Valley along flood-control lines success would have long ago abundantly crowned such efforts.

If the sword of Damocles is suspended over Imperial Valley and if the waters of wrath are held in check only by a tricky guard of sand, let the California delegation but ask for appropriations and the relief prayed for will be promptly granted by Congress.

The writer of this report, in the Senate Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, offered the following amendment to this bill:

"Provided, That the sum of $30,000,000 shall be allocated to flood control, and shall not be reimbursable to the United States."

This amendment was rejected by the committee upon the suggestion of the proponents of this legislation, as was another amendment which directed that the Boulder Canyon Dam be built to only such height as would provide flood control.

TITLE X

AMOUNT OF STORAGE REQUIRED FOR FLOOD CONTROL AND WHAT IT WOULD COST TO PROVIDE SAME

Col. William Kelly, former chief engineer of the Federal Power Commission, graduate of West Point, who served in the Army since 1899, and was former chief assistant to the Chief of Engineers on river and harbor work, secretary of the California Levee Commission, and in charge of the third California Engineering District, which included flood protection on the Sacramento River, also had service overseas and wide experience regarding the handling of streams and embankments, dams and revetment works, flood control and canals, and practically everything that pertains to the handling of water, testified (House hearings on H. R. 2903, pp. 1227, 1228, 1240, April 15, 1924):

"Colonel KELLY. According to the Reclamation Service figures, which check with those of the Geological Survey and those that had been made in my office, 3,200,000 acre-feet of storage, if placed at Laguna Dam, would control the floods in the worst flood season of record so that the maximum flow would not exceed 75,000 second-feet. If that dam be moved upstream certain additional storage must be provided in order to compensate for the storage that exists in the valley now during those high floods * * *. A dam at Mohave 100 feet high will give the storage required * * *. I think such a dam can be built inside of $15,000,000, and that is a very rough guess."

Mr. F. E. Weymouth testified before the Senate committee and gave several alternate plans and the cost thereof for flood control. (Senate hearings on S. 320, p. 479, November 2, 1925.)

"The Reclamation Service worked out a plan for controlling the floods of the Colorado River by building dams at the Dewey site, Bluff site, Flaming Gorge, and at the Juniper site, at an estimated cost of $40,000,000 for the four dams. A dam at the Dewey site could be built for $11,000,000."

The storage at these four sites would be about 9,000,000 acre-feet. (S. Doc. No. 142, 67th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 42, 43.)

"Mr. WEYMOUTH. There has been also a flood-control dam suggested for the Mohave site, but that would cost about $28,000,000 (includes $13,000,000 for flowage damage) for just a flood-control dam. (Hearings on S. 320, November 2, 1925, p. 485.)

"Mr. WEYMOUTH. An eight or ten million acre-feet flood-control dam at Black Canyon would cost $28,000,000. (Senate hearings on S. 320, November 2, 1925, p. 485.)

"Mr. LA RUE. A dam can be built at Glen Canyon in about six years. It will cost about twice as much, but the water will be worth six times as much as the water at Boulder Canyon." (Hearings on S. 320, December 9, 1925, p. 548.)

A dam to store 11,000,000 acre-feet of water can be constructed at Marble Gorge for an estimated cost of $19,000,000. The dam site has been diamond drilled for bedrock. (Senate hearings on S. 728, 1928, p. 463.)

The Marble Gorge Dam site would utilize the same storage facilities as the Glen Canyon site. In addition to being more accessible and with materials for the dam available, it could be constructed for very much less than either the Boulder Canyon or the Glen Canyon Dam. (See Senate hearings on S. 728, p. 463; La Rue-Jakobsen report.)

TITLE XI

IS SAFETY ASSURED?

The proposed dam at Boulder or Black Canyon, as authorized by this act, would be at least 675 feet high. It would be "550 feet above the present water level" and "125 feet below the water level to bedrocks." (A. P. Davis, Senate hearings on S. 320, p. 493.)

There is no dam now in existence comparable with it. It would be equal in height above the water level to the Washington Monument. In this connection the testimony of Col. William Kelly (House hearings on H. R. 2903, April 23, 1924, pp. 1251, 1252) is pertinent:

"Colonel KELLY. As you go up in height the mere weight of the dam itself puts a pressure on the foundations that runs into very large figures. On the Washington Monument that pressure was great enough to cause the stones to sprawl at the edges around the bottom of the monument. * * * In addition to the weight of the structure itself you have the pressure of the water behind it which greatly increases the stresses, especially on the downstream part of the foundation. In order to keep these stresses within reasonable limits the dam has got to be widened out and made very wide at the base."

In this connection I again direct your attention to the fact that the foundations of the dam will be at least 125 feet below the water surface. This is a greater depth than has ever been used as a foundation for any other dam and its total height from bedrock to crest will be 675 feet. Continuing Colonel Kelly's statement, he said:

"Up until a few years ago the usual practice on gravity dams was to keep the maximum stress below 20 tons per square foot. The Reclamation Service in designing some of their higher dams like Arrow Rock, found that in order to comply with that requirement they had to expand the dam at the base to such an extent that the cost became very great. They consequently made use of the arch principle in combination with the gravity section or weight of the dam and allowed a maximum stress of 30 tons per square foot."

The Reclamation Service, evidently in an attempt to keep the estimates of the cost of Boulder Dam within the bounds of reason, felt that it was necessary that some further modification be made, but away from the principle of safety, because, continuing to quote from the testimony of Colonel Kelly:

"In the design of this Boulder Canyon high dam they again found that going up to 600 feet, 30 tons per square foot required a dam of abnormal dimensions, and their design proposes to have an allowable maximum stress of 40 tons per square foot on that 600-foot dam.

The stresses on the St. Francis Dam, which recently collapsed, is reported by press dispatches to be but 12 tons per square foot, or but 30 per cent of the stress proposed for the Boulder Canyon Dam.

Mr. F. H. Newell, former Director of the United States Bureau of Reclamation, in a recent article (March, 1928) on "High dams," stated:

"It is true that each and every one of these structures, big and little, has a limited life. Ultimately each will require renewal or replacement. A dam, like a bridge or similar structure, is in one sense an offense against nature. All of the forces of heat and cold, of wind and water, chemical and physical, are working on it untiring, day and night, in season and out, trying to tear it down. There is no one of these natural forces which is making it stronger."

Mr. W. G. Clark, a consulting engineer of New York City, gave testimony regarding earthquakes in the Boulder Canyon region (House hearings on H. R. 11449, p. 210, February 21, 1925):

"I was in Boulder Canyon when an earthquake occurred. At that time there was a decided movement of the north wall of the canyon, but there was no movement of the south wall. Thousands of tons of rock fell along the north wall of the canyon but there was no fall along the south wall. I was camped on the south side of the canyon and if it were not for the fact that I could see and hear the rock falling on the other side of the canyon I would not have known that an earthquake was in progress.

"Some years later, in 1913, I believe, an earthquake occurred which affected the Imperial Valley. I was in southern California at the time, so went immediately to Boulder Canyon. The same condition had been repeated. I found that thousands of tons of rock had been shaken from the north wall of the canyon, but the south wall remained undisturbed.

"The river apparently runs through a faulty fissure, for in both instances the disturbance was confined to the north side of the canyon at Boulder Wash."

The proposed dam is unprecedented as to height, both above and below water, as will be illustrated by comparing it with the following dams, which are among the highest in the world:

Name of dam	State	Height of dam
		Feet
Pocoima	California	383
Arrow Rock	Idaho	349
Exchequer	California	330
O'Shaughnessy	do	320
Horse Mesa	Arizona	308
Don Pedro	California	284
Lake Cushman	Washington	275
Elephant Butte	New Mexico	275
Olive Bridge	New York	235
Roosevelt	Arizona	225
New Croton	New York	220
Kensico	do	200

These figures are taken from Modern Irrigation, June, 1927.

In the committee I offered the following amendment to the bill in an effort to try to insure, if the dam is to be constructed, a measure of safety to the citizens who live in the valleys below. The proponents of this bill rejected the amendment, which read:

"In order to be sure of the financial, economic, and engineering feasibility of the projects herein authorized or planned, the President is hereby authorized to appoint a board of five competent engineers of outstanding reputation, at least one of whom shall be an engineer officer of the Army, which board shall examine into and review the plans and estimates heretofore made by engineers of the Department of the Interior for the control and utilization of the waters of the Colorado River and report thereon within six months after the approval of this act, and no construction work shall be done or contracted for until said board shall have submitted its report to Congress."

The Boulder Reservoir would hold 700 times as much water as was held by the St. Francis Dam which recently collapsed. I again quote from an article by Mr. Newell:

"Whatever may be the case [St. Francis Dam disaster], the lesson taught is that in all such work there should be a more thorough study than has usually been given to such matters, particularly in connection with the foundation of dams."

Mr. Newell also makes this very pertinent observation concerning the colossal experimental dam now under discussion in Congress:

"How does this apply to propositions now pending before Congress; for example, the Boulder Dam? It is true that considerable time and money have been spent in surveys; various engineers have agreed on certain fundamentals; those who dissent have held their peace. There is little doubt, however, but that if private capital were proposing to build a structure of this kind there would be continuous study and observation of all the phenomena peculiar to that locality. 'With the valor of ignorance' the Congress, however, is satisfied to discuss the legal or political steps and assume that all of the forces, such, for example, as those which have overthrown the St. Francis Dam, are well enough known. Is it true?"

On pages 821 to 845 of the House hearings on H. R. 2903, March 25, 1924, there will be found a report signed by a group of engineers who were appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to review the report then in process of preparation by the engineers of the Bureau of Reclamation. The report is not favorable to the project as outlined. On page 844 the following language appears: "The need for more facts is the rather astounding conclusion one must reach from the data at hand." The letter of Col. William Kelly, who was one member of the board, found on page 269 of the House hearings on H. R. 5773, 1928, is ample evidence that no great weight or consideration can be given to the report of this so-called "board of review."

The only other board which has made any study of the project was appointed during the summer of 1927 by the Secretary of the Interior and was composed of one governor, one ex-governor, a United States Senator, and two college professors. The gentlemen comprising this commission were all excellent and reputable men. I believe three of them were engineers, but I believe that none of them is recognized as an authority on dam designs and structures or has had any experience in actual dam construction.

A majority of the prominent engineers who have testified concerning their studies of the problems connected with the project, and who have not been employed by the Bureau of Reclamation, have testified against the proposed project because of economic and engineering reasons.

TITLE XII

ALL-AMERICAN CANAL

I have no objection to a canal being built "to connect with the Laguna Dam and to deliver water to the Imperial and Coachella Valleys in California," provided that the lands benefited by the construction of the canal will pay for the cost of the canal and its appurtenant structures, and the maintenance and operation thereof. I do object to the revenues from power resources of Arizona being used to guarantee the cost of the construction of the canal and the maintenance and operation thereof. While I understood it was the sense of the committee that the committee proposed that the bill should provide that the lands benefited by the canal shall carry the necessary costs of that project, the provisions of the bill place the burden of guaranteeing the repayment to the Government of the entire appropriation upon the power to be developed. (Sec. 2 (D) and (E).)

I am particularly impressed with the unfairness of such a proposition from a study of the table found on page 80 of the report (S. Doc. No. 142, 67th Cong., 2d sess.), where it will be found that of the 785,400 acres in the project only 167,100 acres were Government lands at the time the report was made in 1922. It is quite probable that in the last six years a large acreage of these lands have passed into private ownership. It will therefore be observed that the provisions of section 9 which give preference of filing on the land to ex-service men is mostly words. I offered an amendment before the committee that would subject the privately owned lands to the same conditions as lands in other irrigation projects privately owned, so that no water user might secure water for land in excess of 160 acres. This amendment is not included in the bill as it is reported to the Senate.

The estimate submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior about a year ago that the all-American canal would cost approximately $31,000,000 was based only upon the cost of the so-called "first unit" of the canal. The canal would only deliver the water into the Imperial Valley. This act provides for the delivery of water into "the Imperial and Coachella Valleys"; this would require an additional canal 141 miles long at a cost of from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000. (S. Doc. 142, 67th Cong., 2d sess., p. 81.)

Wasting water: The use of water in the Imperial Valley in comparison with water used elsewhere in any other State in the basin will be uneconomical and wasteful.

The amount of water wasted annually into the Saltan Sea, according to the estimate of the United States Geological Survey, when the Imperial Valley is fully irrigated, will be 1,387,000 acre-feet. (Senate hearings on S. 728 and S. 1274, p. 267.) This is more than enough water than is required to irrigate all of the land feasible of irrigation, from the Colorado River in either the State of Wyoming or the State of New Mexico.

California is the only State in which water will be used from the Colorado River where it will be wasted.

It has been contended that the construction of the all-American canal will solve the Mexican problem by enabling the United Stats to divert water into the Salton Sea at certain seasons of the year and by thus denying water to Mexican agriculture prevent Mexico from acquiring water rights in addition to those she may now have.

The fallacy of this argument—if there were no better evidence to prove it to be ridiculous—is indicated by the summary of the conclusions from the report of George F. Holbrook, engineer for the United States Geological Survey. (Report D-100-9-L-15, Department of the Interior, U. S. G. S.) It will be found, page 267, the Senate hearings on this bill, and is as follows:

"REPORT ON PROBABLE FUTURE STAGES OF SALTON SEA

"By George F. Holbrook, assistant engineer, United States Geological Survey

"CONCLUSIONS

"(a) Lands bordering on Salton Sea below elevation −240 are worthless from an agricultural point of view. Those between elevation −240 and −230 are worth very little, except in the near vicinity of New and Alamo Rivers. Lands lying between elevations −230 and −220 are generally valuable for farming within the boundaries of the Imperial irrigation district. Outside of the district lands at this elevation are not classified as arable by the Strahorn soil survey.

"(b) The contract between the Southern Pacific Co. and the Imperial irrigation district, granting a flowage right of way to the district will be an impediment that will have to be removed before the irrigation district can waste any more water into the Salton Sea than at present.

"(c) The maximum amount of storm water that may be expected to flow into Salton Sea in a very wet year is 500,000 acre-feet.

"(d) Under present conditions there is being wasted 1.5 acre-feet of water annually per acre irrigated from the Imperial Valley canal system. Upon the completion of the all-American canal conditions affecting the operation of the canal systems in Imperial Valley will be changed. It is not known to what extent these changes will affect the necessity for wasting water from the system. It is believed that the present value of 1.5 acre-feet per acre irrigated is a liberal estimate of the amount likely to be wasted under future conditions. On this basis, with 925,000 acres irrigated, the amount of water wasted into Salton Sea annually would be 1,387,000 acre-feet.

"(e) In order to evaporate the amount of water that may be wasted into Salton Sea under conditions of ultimate development an average water-surface area of 239,000 acres will be necessary. This corresponds to elevation −228 feet.

"(f) With Salton Sea at an average stage of −228 feet and the possibility always present of storm water raising this level to −225 feet, it is not likely that any lands below the −220-foot contour will have any value for agricultural purposes."

It will therefore be seen that the annual wastage of water into the Salton Sea will be a problem in itself and will raise the water table to such heights that there will not be sufficient capacity to hold sufficient water to deprive Mexico of the use of it, as is alleged to be their purpose by the proponents of this bill.

RIGHTS OF YUMA PROJECT

Any analysis of this legislation would be incomplete that failed to recognize the avidity with which its authors have availed themselves of every opportunity for advantage. The bill is inconsistent and contradictory; it is vague and indefinite where it should be clear and certain; and is harsh and unyielding where it should be flexible. But no point has been overlooked where advantage might be reaped, at whatsoever cost—to others—for the interests it is designed to enrich.

A striking illustration of this may be found in section 10, supplemented, extended, and enlarged by the provisions of section 7.

Section 10 empowers the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of Imperial irrigation district, to modify the existing contract, dated October 23, 1918, authorizing the use of Laguna Dam for the diversion of water for the irrigation of Imperial Valley. That may appear reasonable enough to the casual observer, since the Secretary of the Interior and Imperial irrigation district are the parties of record to the contract in question. It should be understood, however, that the contract, in all of its details, relates to property rights and interests vital to the welfare and existence of Yuma project.

The Secretary of the Interior is a party to the contract merely in his capacity as an officer of the United States, in which the title to the Yuma project temporarily vests. The contract was the result of long negotiations, in which the negotiating parties were representatives of Imperial irrigation district on one hand and Yuma project on the other.

The protection to Yuma project, as embodied in the completed agreement, was the result of hard labor and determined effort over the attempts on the part of the California representatives seeking, as they now seek, every advantage for themselves. To disturb the status quo of this contract and agreement without the consent of the organization conducting the affairs of the landowners and water users of Yuma project, which originally confirmed its provisions, would constitute a violent outrage of the rights of those water users.

YUMA PROJECT INTERESTS NOT RECOGNIZED

It may be asserted that the Secretary of the Interior will naturally consult the interested project members, or their representatives, before modifying the contract, as did a previous Secretary of the Interior when the instrument was originally formulated. That does not necessarily follow. Secretaries come and Secretaries go. Secretaries have been known to be partisan. They are human, and humanity is beset with frailty. The water users of Yuma project might indeed be consulted but their protests might go unheeded. In any event, it is proposed to empower the Secretary, with the consent only of one party, viz: The Imperial irrigation district to modify this contract in which Yuma project's very existence is bound up, and the peril that lurks in the provision is clearly shown by the alacrity with which a proposal made in committee for an amendment that would have required the consent of the Yuma County Water Users' Association, was rejected by champions of this bill. The suggestion that Yuma project has any interest in the contract was treated with contempt.

If there were any doubt as to the seriousness of the purpose intended in the authority extended by section 10, it would be removed by turning back to section 7. Taking time and authorization by the forelock, this section, in vital particulars, itself modifies the contract in question.

By the agreement entered into on October 23, 1918 (appendix to House hearings on "All-American canal in Imperial County, Calif., 1922," p. 245), it is declared that Laguna Dam was constructed "in connection with the Yuma project, Arizona-California"; that Imperial irrigation district desires to secure "the right to divert water at said dam"; that the said district is authorized to contract with the United States "for a supply of water"; that the district shall proceed to secure cost data "for the diversion of water" at Laguna Dam and thence "through the existing main canal of the Yuma project" and for a main canal to "connect with said main canal of the United States at a point described as Siphon Drop"; that "for the right to use the Laguna Dam, the main canal, and appurtenant structures, and divert water," the district agrees to pay the sum of $1,600,000; that "the United States shall have and retain perpetually the title to and the complete control, operation, and management of said Laguna Dam, auxiliary works, and enlarged main canal from the dam to and including the Siphon Drop * * *, including the diversion works at Siphon Drop for the diversion and delivery of water to the Yuma project and the district"; that "the United States reserves the right to develop power * * * down to and including Siphon Drop"; that all other power possibilities * * * down to * * * Pilot Knob shall be developed by the United States * * * for the joint benefit of the Yuma project and the Imperial irrigation district, and the cost of joint canal and headworks alterations and of power plants and accessories is definitely apportioned to the United States "for the Yuma project" and to the Imperial irrigation district; that "the preference right to purchase power developed" (between Siphon Drop and Pilot Knob) "shall be given over other users of power to the requirements of the Yuma project for power to be used in pumping irrigation water." Other provisions highly important to Yuma project, relating both to power and to water, are embodied in the contract, which the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of Imperial irrigation district, is to be given authority to modify. Imperial irrigation district, by the permission heretofore given to it to use the Laguna Dam, thereby gained no proprietary interest in the dam, "auxiliary works and enlarged main canal from the dam to and including the Siphon Drop."

The Yuma project, it should be borne in mind, is not solely an Arizona project, but an Arizona-California project. Down to and including Siphon Drop, at which point the proposed main canal of the Imperial irrigation district is to take off from the Yuma project canal, the district, for the considerations named, obtained simply the right to use, but the title to the dam, appurtenant works, and canal to the point described is not affected by any capital investment therein necessary to be made by Imperial irrigation district in order that it may use Laguna Dam and divert water therefrom for the irrigation of Imperial Valley.

CONTRAST BETWEEN PROVISIONS OF THE CONTRACT AND THE BILL

How different are the provisions of section 7, when taken in conjunction with the authorization to amend contained in section 10 of the proposed legislation.

Section 7 provides:

"That the Secretary of the Interior may, * * * transfer the title to said canal and appurtenant structures to the districts or other agencies of the United States having a beneficial interest therein in proportion to their respective capital investments."

The "canal and appurtenant structures," as defined in this legislation, are "a main canal and appurtenant structures * * * connecting the Laguna Dam with the Imperial and Coachella Valleys in California." The estimated cost thereof is about $42,000,000. It will likely be much more. Yuma project's capital investment in the canal and appurtenant structures from Laguna Dam to Siphon Drop is by comparison inconsequential. To the same extent would its title be insignificant, and this project would be at the tender mercy of Imperial irrigation district.

Keeping the provisions of the contract of October 23, 1918, in mind, this further clause of section 7 is of absorbing interest to the water users of Yuma project:

"The said districts or other agencies shall have the privilege at any time of utilizing by contract or otherwise such power possibilities as may exist upon said canal, in proportion to their respective contributions or obligations toward the capital cost of said canal and appurtenant structures from and including the diversion works to the point where each respective power plant may be located."

USE OF DAM ONLY RIGHT GRANTED

The contract gives to the district only the right to use Laguna Dam and divert water therefrom; reserves to the United States the dam, appurtenant structures, and canal to Siphon Drop, and reserves all power generated down to that point. This legislation completely overturns the protection thus afforded to Yuma project by relinquishing such power possibilities "as may exist upon said canal" to districts "in proportion to their respective contributions or obligations toward the capital cost of said canal and appurtenant structures from and including the diversion works to the point where each respective power plant may be located."

Inasmuch as Yuma project under the operation of this measure will have no capital investment beyond Siphon Drop and a relatively small one down to that point, it again becomes apparent that Yuma project, if the proponents of this legislation have their way, must shrink to the status of a very small toad in a very large pond—an all-California pond. Laguna Dam was constructed for the Yuma project. It is a part—a vital part—thereof, and its independent control is essential to the project's prosperous existence. But under the plan proposed it will pass to and under the control of Imperial irrigation district. The contract of 1918, which gave to an eager and importunate applicant—Imperial irrigation district—simply the right to use the dam and divert water therefrom, is of inestimable value to that district, for it is the key to an Imperial Valley canal, all on American soil, and opens the way to extensive revenue-producing power development, the emoluments of which will accrue to the Imperial irrigation district and contribute to its enrichment. But it would appear as if this is not sufficient. All is not too much. A limited right is, by this bill, to be converted into outright ownership, and Yuma project's power resources, slight at best but sorely needed, are to be taken away.

TITLE XIII

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH HYDROELECTRIC POWER IS NOW BEING DEVELOPED BY THE GOVERNMENT

Advocates of the Boulder Canyon project assert that no precedent would be established by the enactment of the pending legislation. It is argued that the Government is now engaged in the production and sale of hydroelectric power at Muscle Shoals, the various dams constructed in navigable rivers, and on several projects constructed by the United States Bureau of Reclamation.

The Congress of the United States, acting under the authority of Article I, section 8, paragraph 1, of the Constitution, "to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," authorized, and, at the earnest solicitation of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Alabama, constructed a dam at Muscle Shoals, Ala., for the primary purpose of developing hydroelectric power to manufacture air nitrates to be used in the manufacture of explosives for the defense of the United States. All other uses of the dam and the power generated thereat are incidental to this primary purpose. Therefore the Muscle Shoals project furnishes no precedent for this legislation.

The Congress of the United States has authorized, and the Government has constructed, dams in navigable streams in various sections of the United States. A list of these projects will be found in the Senate hearings on this measure. (Senate hearings on S. 728, pp. 486 and 487.) These dams were all constructed under the authority granted to Congress by Article I, section 8, paragraph 3, of the Constitution to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with Indian tribes."

The primary purpose for the construction of the dams which were built under this authority was to improve navigation and the excess water which resulted from this primary work was used for the development of power and was incidental to the operation of the dams for purposes of navigation. No precedent can be found under this authority for the enactment of the pending bill.

The Government of the United States has constructed, under the authority of the reclamation law, a number of power plants on Federal reclamation projects. A list of these projects will be found in the Senate hearings held this year on S. 728, on page 262. The power installed on all of these irrigation projects covered in the report, is only 55,000 horsepower. The power, in the first instance, was installed to aid in the construction of the projects and is used as incidental to and in connection with the construction, maintenance, and operation of the projects. The power plants were installed with the consent of and in compliance with the laws of the States in which the projects are located. That legislation does not afford a precedent for the pending act. For further information see the letter of the Federal Power Commission in this report.

TITLE XIV

PRECEDENTS FOR THE RIGHT OF STATES TO DERIVE REVENUE IN LIEU OF TAXES

It has long been the settled policy of the Federal Government to recognize the right of the States to derive revenue from their natural resources when these resources are on public lands.

The importance of this principle is manifest when it is considered that the Government controls large areas of the Western States as public lands, forest reserves, oil reserves, mineral reserves, Indian reservations, national parks, and monuments, etc.

The Federal Government owns 74 per cent of the area of Utah, 67 per cent of Arizona, 87 per cent of Nevada, and 63 per cent of Idaho.

Congress has provided for payments to the States in lieu of taxes in other instances, as, for example, in the agricultural appropriation act of May 23, 1908 (35 Stat. 260), which directs the Secretary of Agriculture to turn over one-quarter of the total receipts from the national forests to the States in which the same are located:

"That hereafter 25 per cent of all money received from each forest reserve during any fiscal year, including the year ending June 30, 1908, shall be paid at the end thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State or Territory in which said reserve is situated, to be expended as the State or Territorial legislature may prescribe for the benefit of the public schools and public roads of the county or counties in which the forest reserve is situated: Provided, That when any forest reserve is in more than one State or Territory or county the distributive share to each from the proceeds of said reserve shall be proportional to its area therein."

In addition, the act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. 843), directs that a tenth of these same receipts shall be devoted to the construction of roads and trails within the forest reserves of the States where collected, so that the States actually benefit to the extent of 35 per cent of the gross Federal income from the national forests.

"That hereafter an additional 10 per cent of all moneys received from the national forests during each fiscal year shall be available at the end thereof, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails within the national forests in the States from which such proceeds are derived; but the Secretary of Agriculture may, whenever practicable, in the construction and maintenance of such roads, secure the cooperation or aid of the proper State or Territorial authorities in the furtherance of any system of highways of which such roads may be made a part."

The act to promote the mining for coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain (41 Stat. 450) specifically directs that 37½ per cent of all royalties collected shall be paid to the State within which the leased lands are located. Section 35 of that act reads:

"SEC. 35. That 10 per centum of all money received from sales, bonuses, royalties, and rentals under the provisions of this act, excepting those from Alaska, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and credited to miscellaneous receipts; for past production 70 per centum, and for future production 52½ per centum of the amounts derived from such bonuses, royalties, and rentals shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress, known as the reclamation act, approved June 17, 1902, and for past production 20 per centum, and for future production 37½ per centum of the amounts derived from such bonuses, royalties, and rentals shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are or were located, said moneys to be used by such State or subdivisions thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, as the legislature of the State may direct: Provided, That all moneys which may accrue to the United States under the provisions of this act from lands within the naval petroleum reserves shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

The same principle is recognized in the Federal water power act of June 10, 1920 (41 Stat. 1072), from which this provision is quoted:

"SEC. 17. That all proceeds from any Indian reservation shall be placed to the credit of the Indians of such reservation. All other charges arising from licenses hereunder shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, subject to the following distribution: Twelve and one-half per centum thereof is hereby appropriated to be paid into the Treasury of the United States and credited to miscellaneous receipts; 50 per centum of the charges arising from licenses hereunder for the occupancy and use of public lands, national monuments, national forests, and national parks shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress known as the reclamation act, approved June 17, 1902; and 37½ per centum of the charges arising from licenses hereunder for the occupancy and use of national forests, national parks, public lands, and national monuments, from development within the boundaries of any State shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to such State; and 50 per centum of the charges arising from all other licenses hereunder is hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in the maintenance and operation of dams and other navigation structures owned by the United States or in the construction, maintenance, or operation of headwater or other improvements of navigable waters of the United States."

TITLE XV

THE QUESTION OF THE RIGHT TO TAX

There is some question of whether a decision on the part of the Federal Government to engage in the production and distribution of hydroelectric power would come within what might be termed a proper function of government; and the question has been raised whether, if it were found that the development and sale of power for commercial purposes was not a proper governmental function, it would exempt such a Government enterprise from the taxing power of the States.

The State of South Carolina, some years ago, engaged in the liquor business and maintained dispensaries. The United States Government claimed the right to tax this enterprise and set up the claim that the operation of dispensaries was not a governmental function and therefore that the State must pay the internal-revenue tax on intoxicating liquors. The State of South Carolina claimed that as a State it was not required to pay the Federal revenue tax and appealed to the United States Supreme Court on this issue. (South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437.) The court held that the State must pay to the Government the revenue taxes; that otherwise the State might go into every kind of business and thereby deprive the Federal Government of all of its revenues.

The minority opinion in this case, written by Chief Justice White, is very illuminating and is here referred to because of the strength of its reasoning. The opinion suggests that the rule applied in this case against the State of South Carolina must necessarily be applied against the United States in the event that the Federal Government engages in enterprises which are not proper functions of government.

If forsooth the Federal Government engages in the manufacture of hydroelectric power within a State and it is found to be not a governmental function, the State, under this opinion, should be entitled to tax the enterprise.

This question which has been raised in connection with this bill is of more importance than it appears on the surface. There are 4,000,000 horsepower of hydroelectric energy yet to be developed in Arizona. The policy which is being advocated by powerful men in the Senate, that the undeveloped hydroelectric power in this country should be developed by the Government, and some of the advocates of this theory grow vehement in their opposition to the States deriving any revenue from such power, if developed by the Government, is fraught with danger to the States and particularly to a State situated similar to Arizona.

TITLE XVI

THE SILT QUESTION

It is 325 miles from the Boulder Canyon Dam site to the Laguna diversion dam. The river meanders through lowlands and the silt control which it is alleged that this dam will provide will not be accomplished, because the water after it leaves the dam will again pick up its burden of silt and carry it toward the Delta.

TITLE XVII

VIEWS OF THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

Attention is directed to the letter signed by Secretaries Work, Weeks, and Wallace of the Federal Power Commission, dated March 24, 1924, which will be found in the 1924 House hearings on H. R. 2903, beginning on page 1000. The letter discusses a dam 605 feet above the present water surface instead of the proposed dam, 550 feet above the water surface and 125 feet below the water surface. The discussion of the project by these Cabinet members remains pertinent, however. A reference to this letter and to the Fall-Davis report will disclose that the appropriation authorized falls short by about $11,000,000 of enough money to build the canal to deliver water to Coachella Valley:

MARCH 24, 1924.

DEAR MR. SMITH: Reference is made to your letter of February 26, addressed to the executive secretary of the Federal Power Commission, suggesting that the commission might like to express an opinion concerning H. R. 2903, a bill to provide for the protection and development of the lower Colorado River Basin.

We do not desire at this time to discuss details of the proposed legislation, but believe it appropriate to call attention to certain general considerations with respect to the plan of development proposed and to the public policy expressed or implied in the bill.

The bill proposes the construction of a dam and reservoir at or near Boulder Canyon on the Colorado River, the so-called all-American canal, certain specified extensions therefrom, and certain unspecified canals and other structures, such works to provide for flood protection of the Imperial Valley and lands along the lower Colorado River for irrigation of both publicly and privately owned lands in California, Arizona, and Nevada, and for making water and head available for the development of hydroelectric power. The bill authorizes the appropriation of $70,000,000 for these purposes. Estimates of the Bureau of Reclamation indicate that the construction of Boulder Canyon Dam to a height of 605 feet above low water and with a capacity of 34,000,000 acre-feet will involve at least $50,000,000; that the construction of the all-American canal and extensions will involve $31,000,000, and the necessary distributing system $15,000,000, or a total of $96,000,000. The obligations involved in the other authorized canals for serving lands in Nevada and Arizona are unknown. These figures do not include power houses, high-tension substations and equipment, estimated at $36,000,000, or transmission lines, estimated at $46,000,000—a total of $82,000,000 more. It is unsafe to assume that the entire project—flood control, irrigation, and power development—can be secured in its entirety for less than $200,000,000, to which must be added millions of dollars of accumulated interest charges during the period of construction.

Flood control and irrigation storage are presumed to be the primary purposes for which it is proposed to construct the dam at Boulder Canyon. While there are differences of opinion with respect to the amount of storage actually required for these purposes, it is agreed that 8,000,000 acre-feet is the maximum required, and it is probable that 4,000,000 feet would be reasonably adequate. The nearer the reservoir is installed to the lands to be protected or irrigated, the more satisfactorily will it serve the purposes of flood control and irrigation. Information recently made available indicates that a reservoir of sufficient capacity to serve all the needs of flood control and irrigation could be located on the river some 100 miles nearer the lands to be served and at a cost of not more than one-half that of the proposed high dam at Boulder Canyon. If this is correct, the location of the dam at Boulder Canyon and its construction to the height proposed must be justified, if at all, wholly from the standpoint of the development of electric power.

In the consideration which has so far been given to the Colorado River there has been too much of a tendency to overlook any other aspect than the flood protection and irrigation of the Imperial Valley. Admittedly this is the acute problem and requires early action, but there is no justification for ignoring other problems which require solution and for failing to plan accordingly. A reservoir for flood control or irrigation is more useful if located at the foot of the canyon section. With respect to power development, a reservoir at that site is useful for the one power development only, and is useless in connection with all power developments above it—some 75 per cent of the total in the section. Reservoirs at the head of the canyon section of sufficient capacity completely to regulate the river must eventually be built if the full power resources are to be utilized. When this is done, reservoirs on the lower river will be useful only for reregulation for irrigation. For this reason dams should be located and their heights determined, so as to provide for full use of the available head and so as to avoid evaporation losses as far as possible. A dam of 605 feet height at Boulder Canyon, as proposed, is not adapted to the accomplishment of these purposes.

The bill proposes that the cost of irrigation canals and appurtenant structures shall be reimbursed to the United States by the lands benefited and that the costs of flood control and irrigation storage as effected by the dam to be constructed shall be repaid by leases of rights in the dam for power purposes; that is, that such costs shall be charged not against the lands benefited but against users of power, the great majority of whom receive no benefit from either flood control or irrigation.

The United States has spent many millions of dollars in internal improvements without reimbursement, particularly on river and harbor improvements and on public highways. These expenditures have been for the primary purpose of facilitating interstate commerce, and on the theory that such a policy was a common public benefit properly chargeable against the taxpayers of the entire Nation. Whether the benefits received from such a policy are in fact nation-wide, the policy is far less questionable than that of charging the costs of an improvement admittedly benefiting a limited area not against the area benefited and not against the Nation as a whole but against individuals and industries for the most part wholly unrelated to the area benefited. We are doubtful of the propriety or equity of so charging the cost of flood control and irrigation storage, whether the construction be financed by private or public capital. If a dam be so located and built as to provide sufficient storage for flood control and irrigation and for a reasonable amount of power, the cost of flood control and irrigation storage if allocated in the ration of storage space reserved for these purposes apparently need not exceed $10 per acre for the area protected and irrigated.

In so far, at least, as the project proposed exceeds the requirements of flood control and irrigation, the bill proposes that the United States undertake a new national activity, namely, the business of constructing facilities for production of electric power for general disposition, an activity which if logically pursued has possibilities of demands upon the Federal Treasury in amounts far beyond those now involved in reclamation and highway construction combined. While the United States has heretofore constructed power developments in connection with irrigation projects, these developments have been merely incidental to the projects, have been of a few thousand horsepower only, and have been primarily for use on the projects themselves. The construction of a reservoir having a capacity of from four to eight times the needs of irrigation and flood control and of a power development twenty times in excess of the probable power needs of the irrigated lands and adjacent communities is a complete departure from former policies. The only undertaking by the United States at all comparable in magnitude with the proposals at Boulder Canyon is at Muscle Shoals, and this project was undertaken to furnish munitions in time of war. In so far as it was to serve the needs of peace, it was to furnish an essential commodity for all sections of the United States and was not for the special benefit of a limited area.

If the United States is to embark upon a general policy of public development of electric energy at Federal expense, it should do so only after full consideration of what the step means. The present investment in the United States in central electric stations—that is, in those plants engaged in developing electric power for general distribution and sale—is approximately $4,500,000,000. That investment will require to be more than doubled in the next 10 years if the demands of industry are to be met. A policy of Federal development would therefore require continuous expenditures of not less than one-half billion dollars per annum, for it could not be expected, in the face of such a policy supported by Government funds and with tax-exempt properties, that private industry could afford to put any additional investment into the central-station business. Under such circumstances we must assume that any such a policy or program of Federal activities is impracticable and undesirable.

If the proposal in H. R. 2903 with respect to power development is not the first step in a general program of like undertakings, it can be justified only on the clear proof that peculiar conditions in this particular case, conditions not prevailing elsewhere, justify the Federal Government in taking action that it does not propose to duplicate elsewhere. Such action can not rest on the ground that the Federal Treasury is the only available sources of funds, for private funds are available now, and have been for several years, to undertake immediately such development as is justified by the needs of flood control, irrigation, and energy supply; or on the ground that the territory to which the greater part of the power must be delivered is in any immediate need of added power, for that territory is already better supplied and at a cheaper rate than any similar territory in the United States. It has been argued that the United States should finance this power development because with a lower interest rate, absence of profit, and freedom from taxation power could be delivered at a less cost than if developed by private capital. This is by no means a necessary conclusion, but even if it were, electric power in only one element in industry, and if Federal financing is justified in the present case on such grounds it is similarly justified in all other cases and in all branches of industry. With the authority that exists in the States and in the United States to regulate and control private or municipal power development, distribution, and sale, we do not believe that the United States should undertake such development unless it can be clearly shown that the development can not otherwise be had.

In 1920, after many years of consideration, Congress adopted a general national policy with respect to power development on sites under Federal control. That policy has been attended with marked success. Millions of horsepower are being constructed under the terms of the Federal water power act. These sites are being held in public ownership under public control, with every essential public interest protected. There is no occasion for going outside of the terms of that act to secure the production of all the electric energy required at terms fair both to the developer and the user. Under such circumstances we do not deem it desirable to enact special legislation modifying the established policy by giving to any individual, corporation, or community special privileges not accorded to all.

Congress also, in the Federal water power act, created a single executive agency for the administration of all water powers under Federal ownership or control. The plan thus adopted is proving eminently satisfactory. We believe any change in such method of administration is undesirable, and therefore, whether the Boulder Canyon Dam or some other be built and whether at public or private expense, we believe the disposition of any power developed should be handled by the Federal Power Commission under the general terms of the Federal water power act and not as proposed in the bill. All interests of the Department of the Interior will be adequately met through the membership of the Secretary of the Interior on the commission.

There are two other considerations which should not be overlooked in dealing with the Colorado River. These are the Colorado River compact and the use of water in Mexico.

The Colorado River compact, negotiated for the purpose of determining by mutual agreement rather than by litigation the allocation of the waters of the river between the several States in the basin, has been ratified by all the States except Arizona. This compact we believe of primary importance in any comprehensive plan of development of the river. Until it is ratified, or it is known that it can not be ratified, we doubt the advisability of the establishment through construction of rights in the lower States of such magnitude as would be involved in the proposed storage at Boulder Canyon.

The regulation of the Colorado River to the extent proposed by the Boulder Canyon Dam will produce in the lower river a minimum discharge far in excess of present irrigation requirements in the United States. The surplus waters will pass into Mexico and will undoubtedly be put to use for irrigation there. Once put to use, their subsequent withdrawal for use elsewhere would be difficult, if not impracticable. It would therefore seem highly desirable to reach a general agreement with Mexico on the problem of the lower river before extensive storage is provided in the United States. The construction of the all-American canal will not obviate the necessity of constant dealings with Mexico in connection with irrigation or protection of lands in the United States. Irrespective of the amount of flood-control storage in the United States, it will, for many years at least, be necessary in the protection of the Imperial Valley to maintain levees and revetments in Mexico, and arrangements must be effected whereby this work can be carried on whenever necessary without interference.

Very truly yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War, Chairman.
HUBERT WORK,
Secretary of the Interior.
HENRY C. WALLACE,
Secretary of Agriculture.

IN CONCLUSION

The great point at issue is whether or not the States are sovereign over their waters, subject only to the right of Congress to legislate for the improvement of navigation.

Arizona can not, under any circumstances, yield her right to an equitable share of the waters of the Colorado River available for use in the lower-basin States. This water is absolutely essential to Arizona's development. It represents the only possibility of the reclamation of a large tract of her arid but exceedingly fertile and otherwise highly favored land. It means, at some time in the not remote future, population, homes, taxable wealth, prosperity, and the subsisting of peoples. Aside from the question of the rights of States and of geographical boundaries, the deprivation of this land of an opportunity for development would mean a tremendous economic waste, both in the production of crops and in the duty of water.

Arizona has 1,500,000 acres of land easily susceptible of irrigation from the main stream of the Colorado River. It is land highly favored both by soil and climatic conditions and lies adjacent to the Colorado and Gila Rivers in the southwestern portion of Arizona. It requires only water to make it tremendously productive of crops of a highly valuable character, and which can be produced only to a limited extent in the United States. This land drains back into the Colorado and Gila Rivers and its irrigation will therefore result in a return flow, and in an important saving of water over the irrigation of land having no drainage, where the water actually used on the land as well as the surplus flowing in the canal is forever lost. Through engineering feats of the greatest proportions all of the water of the Colorado River might be placed by gravity upon Arizona land, but no questionable engineering feat is involved in the utilization of Arizona's fair division of the water available for use in the States of the lower division. This is Arizona's claim, which she presents for the consideration of all who are fairly disposed toward the principle of equity and justice. It may be true that with only one-half of the water in the lower basin at her disposal, some of California's desert land could not be watered. If so, no hardship would be suffered by that State which would not likewise be visited upon Arizona. If some acreage must forever be arid, there is no sound reason why Arizona should be singled out to bear the burden and the loss.

This bill is a reckless and relentless assault upon Arizona. It may indeed appeal to some as a project of superb magnitude, but the bill is ruthless and cynical. It swarms with cryptic phrases. It is not the voice of compromise or an extension of the hand of amity and friendship.

I decline to support such a bill.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY F. ASHURST.

PHOENIX, ARIZ., April 5, 1928.

Mr. THOMAS MADDOCK,
Colorado River Commissioner, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR MR. MADDOCK: I desire to amplify the telegram I sent you yesterday relative to the Swing-Johnson bill.

I find nothing in the amendments inserted in the bill by the Senate committee that is of substantial benefit to Arizona. The following will express to you my ideas with reference to the interpretation of the bill:

1. I doubt if the bill requires the Imperial Valley lands to pay back to the United States the costs of constructing the all-American canal. Section 1, lines 13 to 17, page 2, provides that the expenditures for said main canal and appurtenant structures shall be reimbursable as provided in the reclamation law. I presume that this provision is represented as fastening the costs of the all-American canal definitely upon the Imperial Valley lands. It does not necessarily have any such effect. You know that on the Salt River Project, which is constructed and operated under the reclamation law, we use the power profits to apply on both construction and operation costs. The Swing-Johnson bill in its present form does not make the all-American canal a project separate and distinct from the Boulder Canyon Dam.

Section 2, lines 5 to 8, page 3, provides that revenues received in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be paid into and expenditures shall be made out of the fund under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 4, line 20, page 5, to line 4, page 6, provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall make provision for revenues by contract adequate in his judgment to insure payment of all expenses of operation and maintenance, and the repayment within 50 years from the date of the completion of the project of all amounts advanced to the fund made reimbursable under the act.

Section 4, lines 5 to 12, page 6, provides that if the Secretary of the Interior receives revenues in excess of the amount necessary to meet payments to the United States, the State of Arizona shall receive 18¾ per cent and the State of Nevada 18¾ per cent of such revenues.

Section 5, line 18, page 6, to line 2, page 7, speaks of charges that will provide power revenues and other revenues accruing under the reclamation law without making any segregation thereof. In view of the fact that section 1, lines 2 and 3, declare that it is a purpose of the bill to make the project a self-supporting and financially solvent undertaking, and the fact that every provision in the bill upon the subject fails to definitely segregate the all-American canal from the Boulder Canyon Dam, I am convinced that it is the purpose of the bill to make the power revenues available for paying any deficiency that may occur by reason of failure to collect charges from the lands.

2. The new provision inserted in section 1, lines 15 to 17, page 2, to the effect "that no charge shall be made" for water, or for the use, storage, or delivery of water for irrigation, or water for potable purposes, taken together with the provision in section 5, lines 15 and 17, authorizing the Secretary to contract for the storage of water and for the delivery thereof at such points on the river and on said canal as may be agreed upon for irrigation and domestic uses, seems clearly to contemplate that the expense of maintaining and operating the all-American canal, as well as the expenses of maintaining and operating the Boulder Canyon dam reservoir, shall be paid out of the power profits. This seems to be a further provision to make sure that there will be no profits from power to go to Arizona and Nevada. The provision seems to be too plain to admit of doubt, for it expressly states that no charge shall be made for delivery of water for irrigation, and elsewhere in the bill it is provided that the Secretary may contract to deliver water at points on the canal.

3. The provision for power revenues to Arizona and Nevada, in section 4, lines 5 to 12, page 6, clearly gives said States of Arizona and Nevada only the surplus that may remain. There is no duty on anyone to endeavor to obtain such surplus. Furthermore, the payments are expressly limited to the amortization period. By section 5, lines 16 to 19, page 7, after the repayments to the United States are completed, all of such power revenues are subject to such distribution as Congress may make of the same.

4. The provision in section 7, line 25, page 12, to line 14, page 13, gives to California districts the absolute right to the net proceeds of power produced on the all-American canal, and said districts are probably given the privilege to reduce their annual payments by the annual application of the same. After the repayments to the United States are fully made, the receipts from such power become the property of such districts. The question arises, Why does power produced on California soil belong to the State of California and power produced on the soil of the States of Arizona and Nevada become the property of the United States to be used for the benefit of California?

Section 10, lines 1 to 7, page 18, authorizes the Secretary to deprive the Yuma project of some of the power rights it now has under the contract with the Imperial irrigation district.

5. The provisions in section 5, line 12, page 9, to line 10, page 10, which gives the three States of Arizona, California, and Nevada the preference right to one-third each of the power produced at the Boulder Canyon Dam is limited in its exercise to a period of six months, is limited for use in the State, and is for the price that any other users will have to pay. It places Arizona and Nevada in competition with California, and does not protect their needs for future development in any way. The use of the power purchased by such States is carefully limited to use in the State so that no resale thereof can be made in California, and the price to the States is not the cost of producing the power but is the price at which power will be sold to private users.

6. Section 9, lines 16 and 17, page 16, requires the public lands that will be irrigated by the waters of the project to be practicable of irrigation and reclamation by the irrigation works authorized by the act. As the all-American canal is the only canal authorized, this apparently limits the public lands to be irrigated to the public lands lying along that canal.

Section 9, line 23, page 16, to line 6, page 17, requires that the entrymen of public lands irrigated from said project to pay the equitable share of the construction costs of said canal and appurtenant structures. The words "said canal" must necessarily refer to the all-American canal. It seems plain that the bill is not intended to provide for the irrigation of any public lands in the State of Arizona.

7. Section 12, line 10, page 20, to line 11, page 21, provides that all rights to waters of the Colorado River and its tributaries shall be subject to the Colorado River compact, and section 8, line 7, page 14, to line 4, page 15, provides that the operation of the dam, reservoirs, canals, and other works, and the appropriation, delivery, and use of water for the generation of power, irrigation, and other uses, shall be controlled by the Colorado River compact and any supplementary compact that Arizona, California, and Nevada, or any two thereof, may agree upon. To this three-State compact, however, Congress must give its consent by a further act.

8. The provisions of section 5, line 6 to line 12, page 7, which purport to protect the upper basin States against overappropriation by California, are of no value to the upper basin States whatsoever, because by referring to line 15, page 6, we note that the subject of the contracts is the storage of water in the reservoir and the delivery thereof, and by referring to line 4, page 7, we note that said contracts shall not provide for an aggregate annual consumptive use in California of more than 4,600,000 acre-feet of the water allocated to the lower basin. The said contracts referred to in line 4, page 7, are the contracts authorized in lines 15 and 16, page 6, to wit, contracts for the storage of water in said reservoir and for the delivery thereof. The word "thereof" after "delivery" refers to the water to the storage of which the contract refers. The result is that the 4,600,000 acre-feet of water to which California is limited do not include existing appropriations in California. This argument may not be wholly conclusive, but since the provision is intended to be a limitation upon the right of appropriation of California, we can not help but feel that it is worded as it is for the express purpose of not binding the State.

9. With reference to the same provisions, to wit, section 5, line 14, page 6, to line 12, page 7, it seems unnecessary to point out what has so often been discussed, that the unallocated water includes the water in the Arizona tributaries and that this provision leaves it open to California to receive one-half of the water of the tributaries of Arizona, besides leaving such tributary water the first to be called upon to supply Mexico.

10. Section 12, line 10, page 20, to line 11, page 21, retains the provision in the original bill, to the effect that all rights of way or other privileges from the United States or under its authority necessary or convenient for the use of the waters of the Colorado River or its tributaries shall be subject to the Colorado River compact. This includes rights of way over public lands that are from time to time necessary on the projects on the tributaries in Arizona, including the Salt River project, the Yuma project, the San Carlos project, as well as minor projects on the Little Colorado.

12. Furthermore, I believe the bill to be unconstitutional because in section 8, line 7, page 14, to line 4, page 15, it is attempted to force one of the three sovereign States into a compact agreed upon by the other two.

13. Furthermore, I believe the bill to be unconstitutional because it can not be sustained as a reclamation measure against the will of the States in which the works are to be constructed, and it can not be sustained as a measure to regulate commerce for the reason that while in section 1, line 3, page 1, and in section 6, line 8, page 11, the bill purports that one of its purposes is to improve navigation, the references in the bill above mentioned to the Colorado River compact show that the purpose of the bill is to carry out the provisions of the Colorado River compact, and subdivision (a) of Article IV of said Colorado River compact contains the following declaration:

"Inasmuch as the Colorado River has ceased to be navigable for commerce and the reservation of its water for navigation would seriously limit the development of its basin, the use of its waters for purposes of navigation shall be subservient to the uses of such water for domestic, agricultural, and power purposes."

Thus, it appears upon the face of the bill itself that the declaration that one of its purposes is to improve navigation is not true. Its actual purpose is to destroy the navigability of the river for the development of the basin by agriculture and the development of power.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) JOHN L. GUST,
Attorney for Salt River Valley Water Users' Association.

[Extracts from speech of Hon. Dwight B. Heard, proprietor and publisher of The Arizona Republican]

Expressing the belief that governmental development of the Colorado River along lines which fully protect the interests of Arizona in the stream is the most feasible river plan, Dwight B. Heard, yesterday summed up in a clear, concise manner the present status of the question and outlined the course he believes the people of this State should follow. Mr. Heard's address was made at a luncheon held at the Masonic Temple for delegates to the fifth annual meeting of the Arizona State Horticultural Society.

Mr. Heard declared that the people of the State should get solidly behind their congressional delegation and cooperate in a plan wherein Arizona's rights are protected, particularly with reference to revenue from power generated within the borders of the State.

By means of maps and charts Mr. Heard depicted graphically why the river is the State's greatest asset, showing that 300 miles of the river lie in Arizona and that in that distance it has a fall of 2,369 feet, draining an area of 242,000 square miles.

"We want the river harnessed," Mr. Heard said, "but on a just basis, which must include the revenue to which we are entitled on power developed within the State. During recent conferences in Washington and elsewhere, a great many constructive ideas were suggested and these have been embodied in an amendment to the Swing-Johnson bill offered by the Arizona congressional delegation.

"Arizona has constitutional rights in the river which were ably presented in Washington by John L. Gust. The Government and the State both have rights in the river and Arizona needs Federal cooperation along just, legitimate lines. Arizona, moreover, has an unqualified right to use and dispose of the water within the boundaries of the State.

"Again, the right of Arizona to receive revenue from power generated at sites wholly within borders of the State is unquestioned and this position is fast gaining favor, even in California. The Swing-Johnson bill provides that Arizona shall receive 18¾ per cent, a small revenue after all operating expenses have been paid. The amendment offered by our congressional delegation provides that the two States shall be entitled to 80 per cent after operating costs have been deducted."

Taking the Black Canyon Dam site only as an example, Mr. Heard stated that revenue from the development of power there would bring into the State treasury an annual sum of $1,100,000, if only as small an amount as six-tenths of one mill were taken as a basis of division between Arizona and Nevada.

"We are all agreed, I am sure," he said, "that tax reduction is highly important and necessary to our future development. The enormous revenues to which Arizona is entitled from river development will make tax reduction easy and certain.

"While California does not contribute one drop of water to the flow of the river, whereas Arizona contributes no less than 18 per cent, Arizona gets nothing in the Swing-Johnson bill. A subsidy for the Imperial Valley, based on an appropriation of $500,000 for maintenance of the all-American canal and annual amortization of interest amounting to $790,000, is contained in the first bill. There are many who are convinced that it is included also in the present bill.

"Records of Stone & Webster, engineers and operators of power utilities, show an increasing demand for 150,000 horsepower yearly in southern California for the past three years. Power on the Colorado River can be manufactured and delivered cheaper than it can be manufactured by steam where needed. Los Angeles tells us it needs 1,500 second-feet of water from the river annually for domestic use. Their plan is to pump this water for 1,600 feet over the mountains and take it to Los Angeles in quantities sufficient to serve an additional population of 8,770,000."

Mr. Heard declared that while in Washington he was approached by Senator JOHNSON, who asked him whether or not a compromise of some sort could be reached.

"Senator JOHNSON told me," the speaker said, "that he had been informed that a certain group in Arizona would oppose ratification and development, even though California were eminently just and fair. I assured Senator JOHNSON at that time that if a fair and impartial agreement were drawn, I was convinced the large majority of Arizona citizens would say 'yes.'

"The question is strictly an economic one and should be handled in an economic way. Impartial investigation, too, has shown that necessity and feasibility for reclamation of new lands in Arizona are as great as they are in California.

"Arizona can not afford to approve any agreement or permit development of the river until an equitable agreement has been effected at least between Arizona, California, and Nevada. Arizona must protect her own rights and then cooperate with the Federal Government in development.

"California knows what Arizona's rights are and that this State stands for good old-fashioned justice and nothing else. The State is awake and alert, knows its rights, and is piling up a solid bulwark of public opinion behind that knowledge."

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS

Mr. NORBECK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1271, to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes, by the acquisition of areas of land and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservations for the adequate protection of such birds; and by providing funds for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Dakota.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 6 o'clock p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 13, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, April 12, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Holy Spirit, the most helpful blessing that Thou canst bestow upon us is an understanding heart. It gives to daily life wisdom, charity, and creates the spirit of fraternity; it blesses the humblest and touches the greatest; it discovers a higher and finer application of Thy precepts. With Thy presence our faith is no longer dim, but our hearts are strong and restful. O hear, not so much our words but our unuttered feelings, for they are far, far beyond the birth of a dream. Brighten all the joys of life, soften every frown, and make us kind and brave and true. As we hear life's manifest call, may it not fall in vain on ears that never hear, but let its high meaning bend our purposes out of love in true and pure hearts. Help us to be the men we meant to be and prize our country over wealth and power. Blessed Lord, enter every aspect of our private and public life. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and concurrent resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 10564. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to grant and convey to the county of Warren a perpetual easement for public highway purposes over and upon a portion of the Vicksburg National Military Park in the State of Mississippi; and

H. Con. Res. 29. Concurrent resolution accepting the statue of Andrew Jackson by Mrs. Belle Kinney Scholz, with the thanks of Congress.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had this day presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 405. An act providing for horticultural experiment and demonstration work in the southern Great Plains area;

H. R. 3315. An act for the relief of Charles A. Black, alias Angus Black;

H. R. 5590. An act to authorize appropriations for construction of culverts and trestles in connection with the camp railroad at Camp McClellan, Ala.;

H. R. 5817. An act to provide for the paving of the Government Road extending from St. Elmo, Tenn., to Rossville, Ga.; and

H. R. 9829. An act to extend the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 20, 1922, entitled "An act to consolidate national forest lands."

TAYLOR v. ENGLAND

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 3, I call up a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 161

Resolved, That E. T. England was duly elected a Representative from the sixth district of West Virginia to the Seventieth Congress, and is entitled to his seat therein.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this being a unanimous report of the committee, I move its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CRATER NATIONAL FOREST

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for immediate consideration Senate bill 3224, a bill of exactly the same nature being on the Union Calendar of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 3224 and consider the same. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3224) to extend the provisions of the forest exchange act, approved March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 465), to the Crater National Forest, in the State of Oregon

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 465), section 485, title 16, Code of Laws of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, extended and made applicable to any lands within 6 miles of the boundaries of the Crater National Forest within the State of Oregon. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the Crater National Forest and subject to all laws relating thereto.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. May I ask the gentleman from Oregon what committee reported the bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Public Lands. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. This is a unanimous report?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; it is a unanimous report.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. This is agreeable all around?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the similar House bill will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for immediate consideration the Senate bill 3225.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3225 and consider the same. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3225) to enlarge the boundaries of the Crater National Forest

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of forest management and municipal watershed protection the boundary of the Crater National Forest, in the State of Oregon, is hereby changed to include the following lands, subject to all the laws and regulations governing the national forests: Township 35 south, range 3 east, south half of sections 15, 16, and 17; all of sections 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36; township 36 south, range 3 east, all of sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 33, 34, 35, and 36: Provided, That this section shall, as to all lands which are at this date legally appropriated under the public land laws or reserved for any public purpose, be subject to and shall not interfere with or defeat rights under such appropriation, nor prevent the use for such public purposes of lands so reserved so long as such appropriation is legally maintained or such reservation remains in force.

SEC. 2. That all revested Oregon and California land-grant lands within the exterior limits of the above-described tract of townships 35 and 36 south, range 3 east, shall hereby become part of the Crater National Forest, subject to all the laws and regulations governing the national forests: Provided, That this action shall, as to all lands which are now at this date legally appropriated under the public land laws or reserved for any public purpose, be subject to and shall not interfere with or defeat legal rights under such appropriation, nor prevent the use for such public purpose of land so reserved so long as such appropriation is legally maintained or such reservation remains in force: And provided further, That the Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture shall jointly appraise and agree on the value of the Oregon and California grant lands and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized upon notice of the amount by the Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture, to transfer an equal amount of money from the national-forest receipts and credit the same to the Oregon and California land-grant fund, subject to all the laws and regulations governing the disposal of moneys received from the Oregon and California land-grant lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, my colleague, Mr. CELLER, be granted 10 minutes to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, his colleague, Mr. CELLER, may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, we hope to-day to consider the legislative appropriation bill and go on with it to-morrow. I wish the gentleman would take his time during the general debate of that bill. For the next few days we will take up a number of important bills. I wish the gentleman would defer his request at this time.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Do you propose to consider the bill all of to-day?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Do you expect the general debate on the bill to continue into to-morrow?

Mr. MURPHY. We hope to begin the reading of the bill for amendment to-morrow.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Would the gentleman from New York object to granting my request to-morrow at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SNELL. I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Under the special order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

TAX REDUCTION

AMOUNT OF TAX REDUCTION POSSIBLE

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives passed a revenue reduction bill December 15, 1927. This bill was not in accordance with the advice and recommendations of the Committee on Ways and Means. The Treasury recommended a reduction in taxes of not to exceed $225,000,000. The bill as reported by the committee increased this amount to $233,000,000, and as passed by the House it provided a reduction of about $289,000,000, or $56,000,000 over what at that time the committee responsible for financial legislation in the House concluded after careful study was the safe limit of tax reduction.

It is not my purpose to refer in detail to the particular items that went to make up the increased amount of reduction as voted by the House. I need only to refer to the aggregate amount. It is well known that the Republican members of the committee thoroughly disapproved several amendments added on the floor of the House and that they also disapproved the aggregate figure of reduction. At that time it seemed highly improbable that the bill could become a law unless the amounts were reduced by the Senate. The Democratic members of the committee seemed inclined to make the reduction about $300,000,000, but, of course, this position was assumed by those not ostensibly in power in Congress and certainly not in power in the administration.

The argument made by advocates of the higher figures was largely that at some previous time Treasury estimates of receipts and expenditures had not proven accurate. I shall not discuss this phase of the question, because it should be perfectly apparent that when we are estimating on the basis of $4,000,000,000 an error of 1 per cent either way can not be fairly criticized, although this would allow for a possible difference of $40,000,000. Furthermore, the receipts for the fiscal year 1929 are for the first six months no longer a matter of guesswork but are very accurately determined by the actual payments which the March collections indicate for September and December. The only period requiring a real estimate, therefore, is the last six months of the fiscal year 1929, and the only criterion by which to fix the estimate for this period are business conditions during 1925, 1926, and 1927.

The House bill was evidently not agreeable to the other branch of Congress, as indicated by the delay, until the present time in its consideration. It has been stated that such delay was occasioned by the desire of the Senate to have March 15 income-tax reports available before determining the amount to be recommended for revenue reduction.

PRESENT ESTIMATED SURPLUS

We now come to the point where we need to give careful study to the financial conditions that have developed during the past three months. It is in order that Members of the House may have ample time in which to give such consideration that I desire briefly to call attention to a few important matters which in all likelihood will be brought up later in conference between the two branches.

In no line of governmental affairs is accuracy as much to be desired as in that having to do with the future revenues. It is not sufficient for those not having the responsibility to say the Government can reduce taxes $300,000,000 or $400,000,000. This is like trying to convince people that the moon is made of green cheese. I, therefore, am one of those willing to accept the best information obtainable. If estimates based on such advice are not accepted by Congress, the people will know who to blame when income-tax rates continue the same as those now in force. I believe in reducing taxes to the minimum, but not below a safe minimum, thereby establishing a deficit.

TAX REDUCTION PREFERABLE TO DEBT REDUCTION

Tax reduction is preferable at this time to debt reduction. Debt reduction accomplishes practically the same result, but it unnecessarily takes money out of the pockets of taxpayers, although indirectly saving them the equivalent in reduced principal of the debt as well as reduced interest thereon.

Unless we can sanely, properly, and conservatively reduce taxation, we will find ourselves compelled to retain the rates contained in the 1926 law. My appeal, therefore, to the wise judgment of Congress, is to deal with this problem not politically nor in a spirit of braggadocio and buncombe, but soberly and sanely with due consideration to the figures that have been submitted to us by those most competent to prepare them.

TREASURY RECOMMENDATIONS

In this connection particular attention should be called to the statement which the Secretary of the Treasury made to the Finance Committee of the Senate on April 3. This statement shows a probable surplus for the year 1929 of $212,000,000, and recommends that the tax reduction should be in the neighborhood of $200,000,000. This is $25,000,000 less than the recommendation submitted to the Ways and Means Committee in October last. It is on the basis of present appropriations without any allowance for flood relief or other large authorizations.

The reduced recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury from $225,000,000 to $200,000,000 is not occasioned by a reduction in receipts as indicated in the March figures. On the contrary, the Treasury has increased estimated receipts by $45,000,000, but the estimated expenditures are greater than the October estimate by $85,000,000. This leaves an estimated deficit of about $40,000,000, which accounts for the reduction of the estimated surplus from $252,000,000, the October, 1927, estimate, to $212,000,000, the March estimate.

The increased expenditures are entirely the result of congressional appropriations which were not included in the estimate submitted to the Ways and Means Committee in October, and they include nothing except what has actually been appropriated. These are definite appropriations already approved. It is well known that we have pending several possibilities of enormous appropriations, such as flood control, Muscle Shoals, and Boulder Dam.

In view of the appropriations already made by Congress and the likelihood of additional authorizations, it is perfectly apparent that we must materially reduce the original figure of estimated surplus to be used for tax-reduction purposes.

The decrease in surplus in 1928 will be largely accounted for by the passage of the settlement of war claims act, authorizing an appropriation of $50,000,000. The increase for 1929 is caused by increased appropriations for the Veterans' Bureau, the War and Navy Departments, the postal deficiency, and the public-building program.

It is not necessary to refer to these figures in detail, but I will ask permission to insert as a part of my remarks the tables prepared by the Treasury Department in October, 1927, showing the estimates of receipts and expenditures for the fiscal years 1928 and 1929, which were submitted to the Ways and Means Committee of the House, as well as the revised estimates prepared in March, 1928, and submitted to the Finance Committee of the Senate.

The explanation offered by the Secretary of the Treasury and the details of these figures are illuminating and should be carefully studied by the Members of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert two pages of tables prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury and submitted to the Senate Finance Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to insert certain tables in his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The tables referred to follow:

PRESENT SUGGESTED REDUCTIONS

Mr. TREADWAY. It can be assumed that the House has sufficient business judgment to want to determine the amount of revenue reduction on a proper business and financial basis and to put in the background political advantage and the hue and cry of propagandists.

The Secretary of the Treasury itemizes his recommendations which in large measure are repetitions of those submitted to the House. The Ways and Means Committee did not report to the House these recommendations in quite the form in which the Secretary made them, nor as he has since recommended to the Senate Finance Committee.

My own view is that a reduction in the corporation tax to 11½ per cent is equitable and just in view of the fact that we have done practically nothing in previous tax reductions for the corporations. We are, however, to-day dealing with a practical situation, and a reduction to 11½ per cent would use up so much of the probable surplus that there would be comparatively little left to use along other lines.

I, therefore, advocate a reduction of 1½ per cent, making the rate 12 per cent instead of 11½ per cent as provided in the bill as passed by the House. This will mean a reduction in receipts in favor of corporations to the extent of $123,000,000. In addition to this we have already agreed to an exemption for the small corporations up to $3,000, which will add $12,000,000 more, making the total reductions in the case of corporations $135,000,000.

The other miscellaneous reductions which the Treasury Department has recommended, such as the increased exemption on admissions, repeal of the tax on cereal beverages, and the reduced tax on wines, can well be added as they involve only about $9,000,000.

I believe that instead of a change in the so-called intermediate brackets covering incomes of from $14,000 to $75,000 we should not exceed the $50,000 bracket, which would cause a reduction of about $25,000,000. When a person's income reaches $50,000 it can not fairly be said that he can not pay his full burden of tax. While we wish to deal justly with all classes alike, we must also look at the practical side and make our reductions where we think they are most deserved and beneficial.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. For a brief question.

Mr. GIFFORD. I think the House amended the provision in the bill relating to small corporations radically different than an exemption of $3,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the exemption as it now stands in the bill is $3,000, $3,000 upon incomes up to $25,000.

Mr. GIFFORD. I think the gentleman will remember that the amendment adopted by the House was for a sliding scale.

Mr. TREADWAY. I intend to refer to the sliding scale provision.

I believe the action of the Ways and Means Committee in relation to the automobile tax was fair to the industry, equitable to the purchaser, and practical from the Government's standpoint. I realize that no greater propaganda has ever been waged for the purpose of influencing Congressional action than has been carried on by the automobile industry. If the industry itself were paying this tax it might have some justification, but, as has been suggested time and time again, the purchaser pays the tax. In the press of this morning, however, there is the statement that the automobile manufacturers will cut off that expense to the purchaser of a car. What else could they do? If the tax is taken off how could the automobile industry charge it up to the purchaser of a car?

To the best of my knowledge and belief the number of actual purchasers of automobiles who have found fault with this tax, and particularly those who have refrained from buying automobiles on account of the tax, is infinitesimally small. The reduction from 3 to 1½ per cent will reduce the tax receipts $33,000,000. It seems to me that the argument of the Secretary of the Treasury regarding the automobile tax is so sound as to warrant my reading an extract from it at this point. He says:

> The insistent demand for the repeal of this tax does not come from the automobile purchasers but from the manufacturers and dealers, who have organized an intensive propaganda, and of necessity do not look at our tax problem as a whole but concentrate their attention on the one tax which they believe affects their own interests.
> Tax revision on the basis of meeting the demands of special interests inevitably leads to serious maladjustments of the burdens. As a matter of principle, it is difficult to justify the repeal of this tax. Levied at a low rate, it imposes no particular hardship, yet by reason of the broad base on which it rests it produces substantial revenue. The cost of our Federal Government is already borne to a very large extent indeed, when we consider the size of our population, by the comparatively small number that pay direct taxes. A further material reduction in indirect taxes will produce a very ill-balanced tax system, under which our National Government will be supported not by the entire body of our citizens but by a limited class. The cost of the Government of all should not be borne by the few.

The reduction to 1½ per cent, recommended by the Ways and Means Committee, retains the principle and produces a large revenue without hardship to any individual. It therefore seems to me a practical compromise to adhere to the 1½ per cent rate.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Very briefly; yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman would not intentionally convey the impression that the automobile industry was the only one which resorted to what he called intensive propaganda?

Mr. TREADWAY. No. Our experience in the Committee on Ways and Means would absolve the automobile industry as being the only one that did that. Every industry is looking out for its own special interests. The reduction on corporations resulted in the same thing, and as the gentleman well knows we could take practically the whole tax reduction and devote it to certain items if we accepted the testimony given us by representatives of those interested.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has the gentleman given any consideration, in connection with this matter of pressure, to the possibility of pressure upon Congress with reference to withholding appropriations for roads in the event the automobile tax should be removed.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will say to the gentleman that for my part I do not believe in retaliation. I think every measure should stand on its own base and on its own merits, and for one I should not favor retaliatory measures if one industry benefited more than another. We should consider the road matter on its own merits and we should consider the reduction of the automobile tax on its own merits.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit one more observation, I will not interrupt him further. The problem of good roads, in peace and in war, is not necessarily a burden that should be borne by any one industry.

Mr. TREADWAY. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Having removed the tax from other legitimate industries how does the gentleman justify continuing it on another?

Mr. TREADWAY. There are two arguments, I will say to the gentleman, and the extract from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury very well covers one; namely, that the spread of the base is so broad that it is not a hardship in the form of a tax on any purchaser of an automobile and, further, there can be no testimony submitted that anybody ever refused to purchase a car on account of the small tax imposed. It is now 3 per cent and the committee has shown its willingness to divide that in two. Therefore we can not, if we are going into a reduction of taxes to any extent, take off the entire $65,000,000 which we are now collecting from the sale of automobiles. It is not a question of justification but it is a question of the practical needs of the Government, and it seems to me there is no easier collected tax nor a fairer tax for all concerned.

SUMMARY OF SUGGESTED REDUCTIONS

To summarize, the reductions which I hope to see incorporated in the final draft of the bill are as follows:

Items:	Reduction
Reduction of corporation tax to 12 per cent	$123,000,000
Exemption for small corporations to $3,000	12,000,000
Increased exemption on admissions and other miscellaneous reductions	9,000,000
Reduction of surtax on incomes from $14,000 to $50,000	25,000,000
Reduction of automobile tax to 1½ per cent	33,000,000
Total tax reduction suggested	202,000,000

MISTAKES IN HOUSE BILL

I am one of those who strongly believes in the repeal of the Federal inheritance tax, not so much at the present time on account of the actual revenue involved, but on account of the principle. If repealed, the loss of revenue would be less than $10,000,000 in 1929, but Congress has so clearly demonstrated its desire to retain this item of Federal taxation that I will not at this time suggest or advocate its repeal.

The Garner amendment, which was adopted in the House, imposing a graduated tax on corporations, is theoretically unsound and introduces a dangerous principle in income-tax legislation. True, we had a graduated tax under our war revenue acts, but it was based on the principle of invested capital producing the income. During those war years we based our tax on the theory that after a reasonable return had been earned on the capital invested, it was proper for the Government to apply high graduated taxes to the balance of the income. This was known as the excess profits or war-profits tax.

The invested capital test proved to be almost unworkable and was repealed in 1921 to the satisfaction of everybody. Without it there is no justification for graduating the corporation tax. A hundred thousand dollar income of one corporation may mean a very meager return to the stockholders, while the same hundred thousand dollar income in the case of another corporation may, because of the small investment, represent a munificent return. Size of income, therefore, is no test of ability to pay, and this we have endeavored to establish as the tax principle. This Garner amendment is, therefore, a step toward a return to the excess-profits tax, but without the feature of invested capital which was the only element that made the tax justifiable, even in war times.

The other important amendment adopted by the House when the revenue bill was under discussion in December was also proposed by Mr. GARNER, wherein the House struck out the provision in section 118 applying to consolidated returns for years subsequent to 1928. For the years 1927 and 1928 returns may be made under section 141, which was not stricken from the bill. This section corresponds to section 240 of the act of 1926. What is the result of this situation? It leaves us with consolidated returns on substantially the present basis for incomes of 1927 and 1928. Obviously, therefore, if the effect of Mr. GARNER'S amendment were to increase the revenue—and it, in fact, would have no such effect but exactly the opposite—it could not be felt until the returns for 1929 income were filed in March, 1930, thus affecting the revenue for the last half of the fiscal year 1930 and the following fiscal years.

It is therefore obvious that Mr. GARNER'S amendment can not affect surplus for 1929, since consolidated returns are to be permitted for 1928 substantially as at present.

If the bill should become law with no provisions for consolidated returns after 1928, every close student of the problem is convinced that instead of increasing revenue the effect would be to decrease it by permitting various forms of evasion of taxes by intercompany transactions such as the sale of properties between affiliated companies no longer grouped for taxation as a single unit, at fictitious prices to register fictitious losses. The gentleman from Texas is therefore, in his mistaken zeal, trying to hand these big-group corporations one of the simplest and most effective means of tax evasion possible.

When we have all of these corporations of the group combined in a single return we can prevent these fictitious losses, but once we decided that we will treat them all as separate corporations we no longer have any control over their transactions with one another, and the door will be wide open. And we can rest assured that in the next 12 months they will have so rearranged their affairs, as every accountant will tell you can be easily done, so that no additional revenue would result from forbidding the consolidated return, and the only result will be reduced revenue for the reasons I have stated.

There are other features of the bill which have not been given the attention they deserve and which make it all the more desirable that tax reduction legislation should be passed at this session. The revision of the law looking to simplification of language and administration is a move in the right direction and should be put into effect at as early a date as possible. If Congress fails to write a law conforming with the revenue situation of the present day, and we thereby lose the benefit of the rearrangement of the law itself, the people who have so long called for simplification will have additional cause for criticism for our lack of attention.

SIMPLIFICATION DESIRABLE

However, as anxious as I am for tax reduction at this session, I do not hesitate to say that I should support a veto of the bill in its present form. I therefore urge my colleagues to give most careful consideration to present conditions and the present form of the bill, recognizing its structural weakness and its excessive tax reduction. I further urge that common sense and business judgment, rather than political expediency and the call of the propagandists, govern our future action on this very important legislation.

These remarks are intended to give the House an idea of what is likely to be of considerable importance when the revenue bill goes to conference. I hope that the other branch will pass a bill in such form as to bring the items I have referred to within the scope of the rules of conference.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman now advocates a reduction of the surtax rates on incomes from $14,000 to $50,000. That was considered by the Committee on Ways and Means and was rejected by the Committee on Ways and Means; at least it was not included in the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. It was not included in the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman will be one of the conferees on the part of the House. As one of those who do not favor the reduction of these surtaxes in preference to reduction in special taxes and sales taxes which were recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, I hope the gentleman will not go to the extent of having committed himself now upon a program which will be for him to determine as a conferee.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the gentleman's remarks are well taken. It seems to me, however, that as an individual Member he has a right to express his view, but if he is carrying out the will of this body in conference, that puts him in a very different position. He should feel that it is his duty to act in accordance with the will of the body he represents rather than his own personal views. I, as a Member, have the right to state my personal view.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, yes; I am not disputing that at all.

Mr. TREADWAY. I realize that; and I think there is a very marked distinction between a Member's personal views and the views that he perhaps should hold if he is a conferee between the two branches.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I was certain my colleague had that viewpoint, but I thought it well to bring that out in this connection.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The question of the inheritance tax is not at issue at all at this time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Not at this time. I have stated that I thoroughly believe in the repeal of the Federal inheritance tax, but it is not at issue, unless by chance it is included in the Senate bill, and then, of course, it would be in conference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is it precisely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it included?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is likely to be included in the Senate bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is possible, certainly.

Mr. CAREW. The gentleman would then represent the House and would stand for the position the House has plainly taken.

Mr. TREADWAY. I know the gentleman does not intend to require me to commit myself as a possible conferee.

Mr. CAREW. Does the gentleman hesitate to commit himself?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In view of the fact the gentleman will be a conferee, under the ordinary rules of the House, he is stepping a good long way this morning.

Mr. TREADWAY. I always like to be up in the lead with such gentlemen as the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Tennessee and his associates.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not expect to be a conferee.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will say further for the benefit of the gentleman from Tennessee, I was born and raised a Yankee, you know, and if there is one thing a Yankee stands ready to do it is to trade at almost any time.

Mr. CAREW. But the gentleman will not trade with other people's principles.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman knows what I have in mind.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I think it is very important for the House to understand that the House did strike out section 118 doing away with consolidated returns after 1928 and 1929. I think the gentlemen do not want to give the impression we are against consolidated returns. The committee made no attempt whatever to amend the bill carrying that matter forward. They tried to include those affiliated, under a third method, and I want the committee to occupy the proper plane in respect of the matter.

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman will permit, we are not going to get into a discussion of that question in my time now. I have said very distinctly what my position is on consolidated returns. Whether that was the attitude of the House or not, I think the House made a very serious blunder and therefore I stated the matter as I did.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 6 or 7 or 8 or 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for eight minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I do not feel physically able this morning to discuss the tax question, but I do believe the attention of the House ought to be called to the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

At the time the House overrode the views of the Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee I called the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the conferees would not be in sympathy with the position of the House, and, to my amazement, this morning the gentleman from Massachusetts, who, under the ordinary customs of the House, would be a member of the conference committee, gets up and repudiates the entire provisions of the bill as enacted by the House, including the action of the Ways and Means Committee. I now submit that as a matter of practical, commen-sense procedure of the House of Representatives that kind of member ought not to serve on the conference committee.

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] will come in here and ask unanimous consent to send the bill to conference, disagreeing to all the Senate amendments, and will ask that the Speaker appoint the conferees. When this unanimous-consent request is granted, the Speaker ordinarily would appoint five conferees, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH], and probably myself and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Now, I submit to you that the gentleman from Massachusetts has already announced he will not abide by the provisions of the House bill, and has stated that if he is given the opportunity he will take the suggestion made by the Senate, even to the extent of increasing the tax rates on corporations from 11½ to 12 per cent. That is the gentleman's position. If the gentleman is a conferee and that amendment is in the bill, the gentleman will agree to it, although the House bill provided 11½ per cent.

I submit in all frankness and candor that some of these days the House is going to adopt some sensible method of selecting conferees and the House is going to have conferees that are responsive to the will of this House, with an opportunity for the House to express itself before such a unanimous request is granted.

Let us see the practical effect of this business. The House put on some amendments that the gentleman disagrees to now. One of them is a graduated tax on corporations. I agree with the gentleman when he says it is theoretically unsound—that is his suggestion—but it is practically very sound, and that is the difference between theory and practice.

Any time we undertake to relieve the little man or the small taxpayer, theoretically that is unsound and uneconomic. This has been the gentleman's position for the last four or five years.

When you gave an increased exemption to the individual taxpayer, married and single people, that was theoretically unsound, but practically it is working out all right. The American people seem to have agreed to it. If you go into conference, although the House adopted it, you agree with the Senate to take it out.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to a statement, absolutely erroneous, by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Under the present law corporations can make their consolidated returns or separate returns. Does anybody challenge that statement? You can either make a separate return or a consolidated return. The Standard Oil Co. can do it, the Pittsburgh Coal Co. can do it, the General Motors Co. can do it.

Now, section 118 gives them the same privilege. If they can wash their receipts, as the gentleman speaks of, and escape taxation, they can do it under section 118. They can make a single return or they can make a consolidated return. The Treasury Department shows that over 95 per cent take the consolidated return. The result is, as I charged on the floor of the House and as I charge now, that you are gaining over $50,000,000 by that provision in 1929 from these 8,000 to 12,000 corporations. The corporations that Mr. Mellon is interested in will have to pay millions of dollars more in 1929 if you do away with the consolidated return than they would if given the opportunity to make them. If that is not true, do not you know that the Treasury Department would show that it is not true? It is true in my best judgment.

I first said $25,000,000, but some gentlemen came to me and said you have not got half of it. Then I went to $50,000,000, and I said to the Treasury Department, show me where I am wrong. It would be easy enough to get the companies that Mr. Mellon is interested in and show that he would not benefit by it. You can do that, but you do not do it. And he does not touch that problem in this statement to the Finance Commitee.

There is not a Senator and but few Members of this House who have not been lobbied with since the provision went in, pointing out how it would affect the railroads and telegraph companies. I finally said, gentlemen, you speak about the railroad companies; I will agree to exempt them from it—they can make consolidated returns—I want to catch the fellows like the Standard Oil Co., the General Motors Co., that have subsidiaries extending up to 200—some organized in Washington, some in New Jersey, and some in other States—I want them to make separate returns like every other corporation and pay their equal proportion of the taxes.

Of course, if the gentleman from Massachusetts is placed on the conference committee and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] is in agreement with him, the conference will be of no use as a conference. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon in my time whether he agrees to the suggestion?

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not hear the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, only the concluding remarks.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The conference ought to be open, and I will ask the gentleman, does he believe that the corporation tax ought to be increased from 11½ per cent to 12 per cent?

Mr. HAWLEY. As a conferee, I suppose in the beginning I would stand for the position the House took in passing the bill. We will then in conference do the best we can. It is the duty of conferees to reach an agreement if possible. Personally I would rather have the corporation tax remain as it is in the bill as it passed the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I believe, Mr. Speaker, I will ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I submit to the gentleman from Oregon that that is not a very definite statement. In the beginning you will take 11½ per cent, but finally you would take 12 per cent.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the gentleman is drawing a conclusion not hardly warranted. My final statement was that I preferred 11½ per cent. The gentleman knows in conference we do not always get what we want, but get the best we can from the standpoint of the House and our own convictions on the matter. After the matter is discussed in conference we know the situation, but it is almost impossible to say what will be done before it is known what amendments may be made, and the information and considerations that caused them to be made.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I agree.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I add one thought to my colleague's statement?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. Have we not also to consider in conference the practical situation as we face it?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly you have; yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the point I made, and that is the position that I take.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And the practical situation I want to call to the attention of the House is this, that the House of Representatives passes a bill by a vote of 365 to 38, and one of the Members who is likely to be a conferee announces this morning that if the President shall veto the bill he would vote to sustain the veto.

Mr. TREADWAY. I voted for that because it was the best that I could get. I hesitated even then whether or not to vote for it; and the gentleman will also find in his list there that one of the probable conferees voted against the bill.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That is all right. He was consistent. But I say that when a man votes for a measure in this House, and that identical measure goes to the President of the United States and is vetoed without any additional reason being given other than those he knew, he is not an independent Representative if he then votes to sustain that veto. I have as much right to my opinion as the President of the United States has to his, and if I vote for a measure here such as this was, and it goes to the White House and is vetoed, I would expect to vote against sustaining the veto; but the gentleman says that he will sustain the veto, although the RECORD shows that he approved the measure.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman from Texas always vote for what he expected to get in a bill?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I vote for the best that I can get.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is what I did. I voted for the best thing that I could get, but it was mighty poor.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If it was the best that you could get, would you not vote to pass it again?

Mr. TREADWAY. Not if I could get something better. I say again, if the gentleman wants to know my position, that if the bill as passed by the House should be agreed to in conference and come back to the House with a presidential veto, I would be delighted to vote to sustain that veto. If that disqualifies me from acting as a conferee or in any other position, well and good.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That does not disqualify the gentleman from acting as a conferee, but it merely constitutes an admission on his part that he is not an independent legislator and is going to be governed by the President's veto.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I deny any such insinuation.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That merely puts the gentleman in that attitude and that is all. Now, Mr. HAWLEY, we placed on this bill a graduated tax on incomes, but I believe I shall first go with you a little further back than that. We did not provide for a repeal of the estate tax. The gentleman from Oregon will remember what the vote was in the committee on that. I do. If the Senate should provide for a repeal of the estate tax, would the gentleman join his colleague from Massachusetts in agreeing to that amendment?

Mr. TREADWAY. I did not say that I would agree to the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. As one of the probable conferees, I am not able to say in advance of the conference and all of the circumstances surrounding it what it may be necessary to do to perfect a bill and settle the disagreements between the two Houses.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Then I shall ask one other question. In the committee, if the gentleman will recall, there were only 2 votes out of 25 for an adjustment of the intermediate brackets. Suppose the Senate adjusts the intermediate brackets, as suggested by the administration, reducing the taxes $50,000,000, $30,000,000 of which goes to those having incomes in excess of $80,000, will the gentleman agree to that amendment?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman will probably remember, since he is talking about the committee work, that a certain gentleman from Oregon submitted the facts on which the committee rejected the proposed diminution of rates in the intermediate brackets. Personally that is my opinion still.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That is all right. Now, let me show you Republicans the danger in this bill. It comes over here, and you send it to conference. A majority of this House, by a 2 to 1 vote, refused to repeal the estate tax. You gentlemen possibly remember that the gentleman from New Jersey offered a motion to recommit. And that 93 of the old gang came along and voted for the motion to recommit, with 217 who voted the other way. That was done to keep you gentlemen from having a record vote on the estate tax, because the motion to recommit to repeal the estate tax was going to be made, and you would have had to go on record. In order to avoid that, in order not to have a record vote, this other motion to recommit was made, and you let it go at that. If you send this bill to conference, and the conferees come back with a united report repealing the estate tax, levying the automobile tax, and doing everything you can think of that the House of Representatives did not want you to do, you would have to vote that conference report up or down. Would that be fair to this House? Can this House afford to send the bill to conference with conferees of that nature? If you have conferees that are going to be loyal to the House, who believe in these things that the House did, then you could trust them to vote for those very things, because they would not ever agree to the other proposition without coming back for a vote of the House.

But with the character of conferees that you are going to have—and I say it fairly to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], without knowing where he stands—this House ought never to send that bill to conference until it can get some expression from him of loyalty to the House bill. That is the practical, the sensible way to do. Any other way is a foolish way to do. It is surrendering to another body the things you believe in, the things that you voted for, the things that this House believes in. They are being surrendered through a parliamentary advantage given to the Senate by virtue of disloyalty to the House position. I use that word without intending offense—disloyalty to the provisions and ideas and views of the House of Representatives.

This House ought to have conferees that believe in their souls in the provisions that the House has inserted in the bill, rather than to send it into hibernation and have it brought forth later in a new form by men who do not believe in the provisions inserted by the House of Representatives, provisions in which this House believes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think a moment ago, in answer to a question, I said it was the duty of the conferees to support the provisions made by the House in any bill. But a conference is intended to bring the two Houses together on a disputed measure, and, if any agreement is to be reached, one of the Houses must yield either in whole or in part or with an amendment.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Now, Mr. HAWLEY, I am going to tell you just what I will say to the conference committee when you come to some of the provisions that the Senate disagrees with the House on. I will say to you, "Mr. HAWLEY, do you not agree to that? Let us go back to the House for instruction." Will you come? Will you do that, and come back to the House and get a vote upon it?

Mr. HAWLEY. It will depend on the kind of matters. It would not do to come back on trivial matters.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I am not going to ask you to come back on trivial matters; I will ask you to come back on the vital features of it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think that all serious matters in which the House has expressed its opinion should be brought back to the House.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That is a good doctrine. If I had an advantage in a conference on a matter which is vital, on which the House had expressed itself, and I did not agree with the House, and I was a member of the conferees, I would say to my colleagues on the conference, "Let us go back to the House and see what it will do." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, we must have an end to this addressing the House by unanimous consent. There will be ample time in general debate. I shall object to anybody else having time now until we get into committee. In general debate gentlemen will have all the time they wish.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12875) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12875. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] will kindly take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12875, with Mr. HAWLEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12875, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12875) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for only two minutes. I am sure that will be all the time I shall need.

I wish to call to the attention of the House the vote passed here relating to affiliated corporations. There were about 20 Republicans on this side and nearly all on the other side of the Chamber, under the leadership of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who raised a question as to the effect of that section. I wish to put the blame where it belongs. We believe that the taxpayers should have the privilege of making either a consolidated return or a separate return. When the section which contained three different methods of making returns was defeated we desired some explanation of the change suggested. Because the committee failed to carry that particular section, they failed to amend the consolidated returns section so that it would be in compliance with the old law. They evidently preferred to have it go to the Senate. Some of us have been subjected to criticism because of our attitude. Such criticism should have been directed at the committee. We did not wish to vote another highway for avoiding taxes, by adding a section, the effect of which seemed to be doubtful. We asked for explanation. We are still anxious to be told what would be the results of such legislation and why it is desired. We have been told that we defeated the consolidated returns feature. Rather, we believe in that and the committee should have amended its bill so as to continue the privilege of making consolidated returns.

I make these few remarks so that some 20 Republicans may not hereafter be blamed for opposing that section in the bill.

I, for one, am still desirous of knowing the effect of the suggested method which would allow any two or any group of affiliated corporations to consolidate their returns, and I hope that the genial chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will some day put this information in the RECORD.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, there are many controversial questions which come before this House from time to time, and sometimes it is difficult for us to have a perfect understanding of the questions on which we must sooner or later vote; so it is my intention, in so far as it is within my ability, to give you a correct understanding of the proposed Columbia Basin irrigation project in the State of Washington. There are in the world opportunists and there are in Congress statesmen. I want to talk to the statesmen. I want you to understand that we are talking of a development not for to-day but for the future.

At the point on this map marked by an "X" is the location of the Columbia Basin project, which will embrace, when finally developed, 1,883,000 acres. The water supply may come from the great watershed lying to the east of this project over in Montana and in Idaho, where there are lakes and canyons, where storage can be provided. Water would be diverted from Clarks Fork at Albany Falls [indicating], Idaho, near Newport, Wash., and carried down through this way [indicating] to Hillcrest. There is another method suggested whereby a dam may be constructed in the Columbia River and the water brought down through here [indicating on map]. So there are two sources of water supply that are available.

There have been some partial failures of reclamation projects in the West. Usually these have resulted from an inadequate water supply. Sometimes it has been because of the undesirable and untillable lands that were included.

Going to the State map of Washington, the lands embraced within this outline [indicating] represent the Columbia Basin project, lying mostly as a great level plain in my district in southeastern Washington. A part of the land is gently rolling. There is one point that was visited last year by the Reclamation Committee of the House and by the Reclamation Committee of the Senate where they went upon a small mountain known as Table Mountain. From there you can look for many, many miles in every direction. The land lies almost as level as this floor; it is as fertile as any land to be found in the United States except that it lacks water. We do not have hardpan; we do not have in the lands that are proposed to be irrigated an outcropping of rock, or anything of that kind. We have real soil to begin with from 3 feet to 100 feet deep.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is the area of the land marked "X"?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. One million eight hundred and eighty-three thousand acres.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Washington. May I suggest that that area probably includes some land not within the irrigable classification, and it would probably be 3,000,000 acres all told.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; there are about 3,000,000 acres all told, but 1,883,000 acres of high-class lands are proposed to be irrigated.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Could the gentleman say what proportion, if any, of that area of 1,800,000 acres is now operating under dry farming?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. About 400,000 acres, to the best of my knowledge, but that varies. Much more of this land was in cultivation at one time, but the rainfall of 6 to 10 inches is not sufficient for successful farming. Some claim there was an abnormal rainfall that stored up moisture there and they were able to produce wonderful crops for a short period of time, while others claim that the moisture which had been stored up through the years before it was cleared of sage brush and put into cultivation was gradually exhausted. Anyhow they were able to till several hundred thousand acres of that land long enough to demonstrate that with moisture it is a very productive section. But for many years there has not been sufficient rainfall on which the farmers might depend for successful farming.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman permit one more question?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. Of the 1,800,000 acres what proportion is publicly owned and what proportion is privately owned?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. This land was homesteaded very largely at the time I speak of, along about 25 years ago, but the men who built their little cabins in there, who went on the land and tried to establish homes have had to move off, and they are in all parts of the the United States. So it is in private ownership very largely.

As to the exact amount that is in Government ownership, I believe it is about 10 per cent. Some of it is State owned. There is some land within this area that is yet farmed and farmed successfully, where they have sufficient rainfall.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What could they raise there with irrigation, and what do they raise now?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. By dry farming; that is, raising a crop every second year and plowing and cultivating and storing up moisture on the alternate year, they grow wheat almost exclusively. If it were irrigated, it would grow practically anything that is grown in the United States, because we have an unusually long growing season—about 27 weeks between the last frost in the spring and the first frost in the autumn. Sugar beets, for instance, are known to produce wonderfully well on nearby adjacent territory. This is a crop that we might develop almost to an unlimited extent and still not interfere with any crop now produced in the United States because, as you all know, we are importing the big part of our sugar and always have been regardless of the efforts we have made to develop a home sugar supply.

If there are any other questions in regard to the soil, I would like to have them asked now.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit, what is the elevation, in general, of that area?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. At this point Hillcrest [indicating on map], it is 1,700 feet-plus, and at this point, Pasco, it is about 400 feet. So the general slope is from the northeast to the southwest, which not only makes it very desirable for irrigating but also facilitates drainage, and the drainage has to go along with irrigation. That is one thing that was not known in the beginning of irrigation in this country.

There are, coming down through this big section, a number of dry streams. Sometimes they are streams and at other times they are only dry channels, and there are a number of canyons, all of which would facilitate drainage.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. It was originally prairie land, was it?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is a great sagebrush plain.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman discuss later on the engineering feature and the possibility of combining the irrigation phase of it with the electric-power possibilities?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will make some reference to that later.

In establishing a successful irrigation project we must have an abundant water supply. If the water is taken from the Clarks Fork of the Columbia River over at Albany Falls across the line in Idaho, the annual run-off there is three times the amount that would be required for this project. If it is taken from the Columbia River down here [indicating] we would have a still greater water supply. So from whichever source the water might be taken, there is an enormous superfluous water supply, so there never could be any shortage or any question of an adequate water supply.

Here we have two factors necessary to a successful irrigation project.

The third one is the climate. As I have said, the growing season is 27 weeks, and I may say that three-fourths or probably four-fifths of all the Central States have a shorter growing season than that. So we may grow practically anything here. Alfalfa, of course, we can produce several crops during the year.

Therefore, the three factors soil, water, and climate are here.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I presume the gentleman from Washington is for the McNary-Haugen bill, is he not?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I am going to discuss that feature of it. I know what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I did not want to ask the gentleman a personal question, but I thought perhaps the gentleman had already settled on that question, and what I wanted to know and what puzzles the men from the cities——

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Is the surplus.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; if you have got to have the McNary-Haugen bill to take care of the farmers, why should we have more land to produce crops to compete with the farmers?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I am going to answer that question and I hope the gentleman will bear with me until I reach it in just a moment or two.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I want to discuss that question.

We have passing through this area at the present time four transcontinental railroads and another railroad that connects up with all of these transcontinental lines, which makes the equivalent of five transcontinental railroads passing through the project at this time. No other project in the United States like it. There are many State and county highly improved highways that pass through the project. There are many towns, there are county seats and towns from 500 to 1,000 or 1,500 people dotted all about through here [indicating] where they are still doing some dry farming or where they have secured a little water for irrigation, or where they built up towns when farming was more prosperous several years ago. There are schools, there are churches, there is everything there to make a community. I want you to get that picture. This is not a wilderness far removed from civilization that will be difficult to develop. We have all of the factors save one thing, and that is water.

As to the plan of financing, it was said here a day or two ago it was going to require $300,000,000. This chart will indicate what those who have devoted years to a study of this question think will be required.

From 1928 to 1933, a period of five years' time, we want $250,000 to continue the surveys, the investigations, and the solution of the allocation of the waters, an interstate problem, you understand, which has to be acted upon by Idaho, Montana, Washington, and Oregon through the different State legislatures. Then their acts must be confirmed by an act of Congress, all of which is going to take considerable time. There are many other investigations and detail surveys to be made on the project and that would be the amount estimated for the first five years.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. With pleasure.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman confirm my understanding that the bill before the House proposes a definite commitment of the Government to the project; in other words, the Government approves the project and commits itself fully?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It approves the project.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has the Department of the Interior as yet recommended to Congress the adoption of the project?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No; the Department of the Interior has not, because they say they must have further investigation.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman knows the distressing history in certain sections of the West where Congress has given reason to believe that certain improvements would be made and then appropriations did not follow, because something intervened and the people who went on there were on the edge of starvation for years. In order that we may avoid the possibility of that recurring—the possibility that when Congress approves of the project that the bill proposes and then proceeds to investigate and the investigation brings out facts not anticipated and Congress concludes not to go ahead, and distress follows to those who will be called on to the area by the action of Congress—why isn't it much wiser for us to proceed first with investigation, entirely without the commitment of the Government, than to first commit the Government and then proceed with the investigation?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will be glad to go into that in detail. To begin with, this has been investigated for a period of about 10 years. There have been numerous surveys—engineering surveys, soil surveys, surveys made by the State of Washington, surveys made by the Federal Government, a review of the State survey, a review of the Federal survey, as my colleague, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL], stated two days ago. You will find all that in the record. These surveys have been made by very high-class engineers.

At one time General Goethals was called on and spent 30 days over the project and then 6 months in checking up on the surveys and he passed favorably on the project. So it has been passed on by what we think are the most competent of engineers—certainly as competent as are to be found in the United States—a number of times without exception. All are agreed the project is feasible. There have been demonstrations as to the productiveness of the soil and in the areas where they can get water it is wonderfully productive and profitable. Feasibility is settled so far as we are concerned.

But every time we need a little more money—and, by the way, the State of Washington has put up more money than the Federal Government—all together there has been about a half million dollars spent in investigation. But every time we need a little more money a group of men must come 3,000 miles, appear before a committee and justify the project. That has been done before the Reclamation Committee time and again. We feel that the adoption of this project would obviate that.

Suppose the bill before the House was adopted. Then the amount that would be asked for now would be to continue investigations and surveys and the allocation of water, all of which would require time, probably about five years. Of course, we can not expect anything in the future except it be recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, passed upon by the Budget, passed upon by Mr. CRAMTON'S appropriations subcommittee, the whole Appropriations Committee, the House and the Senate and, finally, secure the President's signature. So you see the future is amply safeguarded.

But we would like to get rid of having to come down here to justify the project over and over again as we have been doing for the last 10 years. There is a group of devoted men out in the Northwest that has been meeting and discussing this project every week for eight years, individuals and communities have given unselfishly and without stint of their time and money.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will be glad to.

Mr. CRAMTON. First just let me emphasize again that just the minute Congress passes a bill adopting this project there will be a renewal of interest in that country; settlers will go upon it and try to get in early when the land is not expensive; they will go in and wait for the Government to bring water to them. That the gentleman knows will be the effect of an approval and adoption of the project by Congress. On the other hand the gentleman suggests that $250,000 worth of investigation by the Federal Government in addition to some outside contribution will be needed in the next five years. The gentleman knows that that means substantial investigation. Asking for $250,000 for further investigation demonstrates the framers of the project realize that General Goethals and the engineers have not entirely completed the necessary investigations.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. These investigators have worked out the detailed construction plan very largely and engineers have been checking and rechecking but working plans are not yet completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wash ington has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman knows that in the course of this investigation some unsuspected condition may be found that may make the project, or a material section of it, not advisable. If Congress is to take any action at this time would not it entirely meet the gentleman's statement of needs without the danger of misleading the public, for Congress to authorize the appropriation to the extent of $250,000 to further study and investigate?

I am frank to say that I do not profess to be in favor of even that action, but this is to bring out the gentleman's views. Would not such action by Congress, authorizing such an appropriation for the next five years, meet all of the needs the gentleman has spoken of without formally committing Congress to the whole project?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Probably it would take care of the actual financial needs as far as that is concerned, but I have pointed out that committees have to be brought down here over and over again for a distance of 3,000 miles at very great expense in order to present this matter to congressional committees from time to time.

Mr. CRAMTON. In response to that I may say that whatever kind of bill is passed, someone has to come before our subcommittee from year to year to present the case, even if there has been an authorization.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That would be done by the Department of the Interior and the representatives.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is proceeding upon the theory, although not so stated, apparently, that this is more or less of a wildcat scheme, that has not been demonstrated, because you are estimating an expenditure of $250,000 for the next five years for further surveys and investigations. Is it not a fact that the feasibility of this project has been conclusively demonstrated, affirmatively reported as such by the engineers?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; of the Federal Government.

Mr. HADLEY. And that these are matters of record in the department, and that the question of feasibility is closed and that the investigations and surveys sought relate solely to matters of detail with reference to construction and the evolution of the project, the feasibility of which has already been conclusively determined?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. My colleague has correctly stated the situation.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Notwithstanding the answer to the question of the gentleman from Michigan, by the gentleman from Washington who has just taken his seat, does the gentleman think on the whole that it is wise for us as a Congress to commit ourselves definitely to a project which will commit the Treasury of the United States to an expenditure of $180,000,000 without Congress being definitely advised as to not only the engineering features but the economic features, by the responsible department of the Government, namely, the Interior Department?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. There are voluminous reports by Government engineers covering all of this in detail.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] corrects me as to the ultimate expenditure of $180,000,000. He says that we will be committing ourselves to an expenditure of what may amount to $300,000,000.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I must proceed in order to get that part of it straight. After the period of investigation and the working out of the problem between the States as to the water supply, it is estimated by some of the best engineers that it will require 10 years for actual construction, and so I put the period of construction from 1933 to 1943, and allow for an expenditure of $12,000,000 annually, or a total sum of $120,000,000.

The financial plan that has been worked out would call for that expenditure on the main canal, storage, and things of that sort, and then $30,000,000 as a revolving fund. From 1943 to 1948, a period of five years will be required for the settlement of the first unit. It is proposed to develop the project in units. That would embrace something over 470,000 acres. When that unit is developed and is a going concern the unit would be bonded in order to develop the second unit, which requires from 1948 to 1953, and then the third from 1953 to 1958, and finally the fourth unit from 1958 to 1963. At the end of that time the Federal Government would have $150,000,000 in the project. That covers a period of 35 years. While this sum would not come from the reclamation found it would be repaid upon the same terms as the reclamation fund is repaid. Some mention was made of $180,000,000 by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT], and I suppose he uses those figures because he sees them here on this chart. Based on the production of the Yakima project and also the Wennatchee project, but discounting the value of production, it is estimated that the total production would be $180,000,000 a year from the entire project when it is developed. What would become of that $180,000,000? None of us shut our eyes to the effect this is going to have on our own State. Settlers would require 25,000 automobiles, 25,000 plows, 25,000 harrows, fencing, home furnishings, and everything else that comes from the East.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman goes into that, am I not right in understanding that however it is to be financed, the construction cost will be approximately $300,000,000?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; the gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. CRAMTON. But you do not in your plan contemplate that it all comes from the Federal Treasury?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. We do not contemplate having more than $150,000,000 of it invested at one time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Under the plan, with that first unit settled, after it is completed, it is proposed to take up the construction of the next unit through a bond issue put upon the first unit? The gentleman is aware that those settlers, the most of them, will have bought the land on credit as much as they can. They will have acquired as much credit as they can for improvements and implements, and so forth. In fact, the Irrigation Committee has reported out a bill—I may not state it correctly—which I think contemplates a loan of about $3,000 to each settler on reclamation projects of a similar character. So that these settlers will have all this indebtedness and will also owe the Government $150 an acre for the water rights. What about the feasibility of bonding that situation for any appreciable amount, with the proceeds of which to go ahead with further construction?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. This has been worked out by some very capable financiers, and it is not thought that there will be required at any time bonding on any of the land in an amount beyond what it will safely carry. I am pleased to answer all questions, but I am afraid the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] might not want to yield me more time.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman assures me that he will yield you more time. Is there any assurance or any negotiations to secure assurance that the cities of Spokane, Seattle, Tacoma, or counties, or railroads, or other concerns are to be expected to assist in that financing?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. For the first time I believe in the history of reclamation that thing will be done. A law was enacted by our State legislature which permits the levying of an ad valorem tax upon town property and business that are within the project and those that are adjacent that will be benefited by the project. For instance, we do not think it is fair for a piece of property to enjoy the benefits and carry none of the burden.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield me 10 minutes more?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield 10 minutes more.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In the case of a town that is struggling for existence at this time, but which would be made very prosperous by the development of this project, we believe that the town and business there should bear some part of the burden that will bring the prosperity that will come to that town. We believe that Spokane, a large city which will be tributary, should bear part of the burden, and Spokane thinks so, and they were largely instrumental in getting that legislation enacted.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman knows that that follows the suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations that in this work of financing the communities and States should assist the Federal Government.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Has any other State acted on that suggestion.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not the first time it has been acted upon by projects, but perhaps it is the first time in the initiation of a new project.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is the intention to hold the land holdings down to what the Secretary shall declare should be the proper farm unit, of 40 to 80 acres. At this time the land is worth $1 to $5 an acre, but with water it is as productive as any acre of land within your knowledge. I say that without fear of contradiction on the basis of irrigated areas that are distributed all through this project.

Mr. MENGES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Just for a question.

Mr. MENGES. Does the gentleman know what profits are made by those people who planted the land referred to with fruit, outside of this project?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Fruit, as all other crops, varies greatly. I remember the figures as to a small irrigation project a few years ago, where all the land under cultivation averaged $300 per acre. The fruit crop on a selected tract sometimes will yield a thousand dollars an acre, but the next year they may have a limited crop. The expenses may be so high that there will be no profit.

Mr. MENGES. Does the gentleman know whether any profit was made by those fellows who made fruit crops in that section their chief products?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In this section Wenatchee [indicating] their efforts are devoted almost exclusively to fruit. Twenty-five years ago they shipped one carload of fruit, last year they shipped about 20,000 carloads. In the Yakima region they are devoting a great deal of attention to dairying and alfalfa, and their activities are more diversified, though it is a wonderful fruit country and fruits predominate.

Mr. MENGES. Would this project be worth anything so far as dairying is concerned?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It would be one of the finest dairy countries in the United States, because the winters are short and mild, the transportation facilities are good, and the climate is agreeable to the cattle.

Mr. MENGES. The land would yield itself to diversified farming?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; to diversified farming; to dairying, sugar-beet culture, or small fruits, or poultry, or anything of that kind. We want to develop it without speculation for home owners.

Mr. MENGES. I suppose it would be more profitable to devote it all to sugar beets.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, it is well known to all who have a knowledge of agriculture that if you have fertile soil and water you can raise almost anything. Can the gentleman tell us what plans have been studied and what projects are under consideration, not only to use the water for irrigation, but to use the weight of the water to produce power? That is the most important thing before this country to-day.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will say in answer that while these are problems to be determined finally by the Federal engineers, most of the engineers, I believe, favor the gravity plan. There are other engineers who advocate the construction of a dam 200 feet high in the Columbia River at the head of the Grand Coulee, which is the old bed of the Columbia River thousands or perhaps millions of years ago. It would also be necessary to pump 400 feet. If a dam were constructed you would have that enormous river with a 200-foot waterfall, so that the gentleman can imagine what would be possible in the development of power. Those are plans to be determined by the Government engineers.

Mr. HILL of Washington. On that point I may say that the hydraulic engineers on that question of development of power testified before the committee that there will be sufficient secondary power to provide energy for pumping and one and a quarter million primary horsepower for commercial distribution.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That would take care of the needs of this new locality which would be developed.

Mr. HILL of Washington. It will take care of all the needs of the area which the gentleman from Washington has pointed out.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. It is well to take into consideration also the average elevation of Pend Oreille Lake and the average elevation above sea level of the area to be put under cultivation, and it is what—about 750 or 1,000 feet?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. From Pend Oreille down to the center of the project?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. About 1,000 feet.

Mr. ARENTZ. So you have a 1,000-foot drop in that distance from Lake Pend Oreille to the center of the project.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. There would be some power developed by this plan but not as much as by the other is what I meant to say. Now, I want to answer the gentleman from Baltimore, in regard to the farm surplus. I have said many times, and I say it out in the State of Washington and to you, that if this could be developed by the waving of a wand at this time I should not be in favor of waving the wand because it is not needed at this time. It can not be developed in a short period of time, but there is coming a time when it will be needed and when it ought to be developed, and that is the time we are looking forward to. We are planning for the future. We must proceed now in order to have the development when we need it. That is why I said in the beginning there are in the United States opportunists and there are statesmen and that I wanted to talk a little while to the statesmen who are willing to look 30, 40, and 50 years in the future.

We are not asking for any big appropriation of money at this time. We are not asking that this be put where Congress, the department, and the President will not always have a check on it, but we do think, after 10 years of arduous labor out there, beyond anything that you can conceive of, gentlemen, by all of those communities, which have been contributing in time and money, and the $500,000 that has been spent, that we are justified in asking for this further step that I have described.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. At all times during the period of development of this the rapidity of development will absolutely rest with Congress and with the executive departments.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. My colleague is correct in regard to that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it not also true that that will be comparatively new country and that we must look ahead not merely to an appropriation bill for the next fiscal year but 75 and 100 years from now, so that we will at least turn over to the next generation a country in keeping with the times?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman has well stated what I had in mind, but the opportunist, as I say, is looking a year or two ahead, but we must look further.

Now, there are a few things I want to cover and then if I have the time I will answer other questions. While our people would like to have it developed in a shorter period of time, I do not think it can be developed and all of the land put under cultivation short of the years I have indicated, which would be 35 years. But let us take it on the basis of 30 years and take into consideration the increasing population of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Barring unusual catastrophes this country will have 60,000,000 more population before this project is in full production. What does that mean? It takes on the average over the United States between 3 and 4 acres of land for every inhabitant of the country. Taking into consideration the fact that this is irrigated land, instead of 3½ acres for each inhabitant, let us say 1.8 acres, to make it come out even would support one person throughout the year. So this project when fully developed would take care of 1,000,000 people, or one-sixtieth of the increase in population, during the construction and development of the project. So it would not interfere with the supply and demand at the present time. It would not interfere with the eating away of the surplus by the next 10,000,000, nor 15,000,000, nor 25,000,000, nor 30,000,000, nor 40,000,000, but the only thing we would be able to do would be to take care of one-sixtieth of the increase.

But there is another phase of this. The testimony before the committee, from a gentleman who had traveled in the Orient last year, revealed many interesting things. He called attention to the fact that Japan is being very rapidly industrialized and that they can not by any means feed themselves at this time and that they are calling on us for increased food supplies all the time. The commerce reports show that. China is doing the same thing. He called attention to the fact that one firm he interviewed there was taking 4,800 boxes of our apples every two weeks and that another firm was taking 10 tons of American ice cream every two weeks to serve in China. He made the statement that all the leading restaurants in the Philippines, China, and Japan were featuring and serving American fruits and vegetables, because of the contamination in their soil, and that they were getting higher prices for them and that they were being more extensively served.

I do not recall the total population of China at this time, but he spoke of the improvement of social conditions, the better development. Regardless of all the wars they have been having he made this statement, that China looks to the western part of the United States for its additional food supplies, and that if their purchasing power increased $5 per inhabitant per year that would call for $2,500,000,000 worth of products.

So how insignificant $180,000,000 of products would be dumped over there. We have the territory beyond the sea in China, in Japan, in the islands, to say nothing of what we ship by the western coast and through the canal around to England and the European countries, in addition to what I have already told you about the increase in population of the United States.

So I can not see how this development could possibly complicate the farm problem or enter in any way into that controversial question. It is too far in the future, but we must look to the future if we are going to have development. I am farming 2,000 acres myself, and certainly have the farm viewpoint, but I see no menace here.

I want to call your attention to this map of the State of Washington. Do you realize what all these colored areas mean? These [indicating] are national forests. These lands belong to you. They do not belong to me and they do not belong to my people. They do not pay any taxes. Here is an Indian reservation that belongs to the American Indians and is untaxed land.

Here is a national forest, here is a national monument, here is an Indian reservation, another Indian reservation, another national forest, another national forest. So you see that a great part of the area of the State of Washington is comprised of national parks, national forests, Indian reservations, and national monuments, to say nothing of the public lands that are dotted about all over the State. Speaking roughly, I should say that fully one-half of the State of Washington belongs to you and not to me or to my people.

When you develop this area you are going to increase the value of all the land in the State of Washington—your lands as well as ours. You are going to, presumably, lend to the people out there money to develop this project. They agree to pay back and will repay. We think in view of the fact that half of the State belongs to you, it is not asking anything out of the way to ask you to lend the money to develop a part of that country and to be repaid by the people who go on the land, which will in turn create a greater demand for your timber and ours and will increase the value of all of the land.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman has some figures there that I was hopeful he would reach.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; I am very glad the gentleman reminded me. These figures down below pertain to the reclamation fund. They were given me by the Reclamation Bureau this morning over the telephone.

Mr. ARENTZ. Is the gentleman going to go into the number of projects that that $225,000,000 represents and show that it is money scattered on all the projects throughout the West?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. A few moments ago a gentleman from the East, a good friend of mine, said, "Our people look upon reclamation as a big graft." I said, "I wish you would stay a little while. I would like to tell you something about it; I fear you have a misunderstanding." I stated further that the money is repayable, but he said, "Is it repaid?"

Now, here I am going to give you figures showing the charge-off and all the rest of it, and if you will permit me to give this in detail, I will then answer any questions.

There has been expended $225,000,000 for construction and operation and maintenance of the projects; that is the total for 26 years on 26 projects. So that represents all of the money that has been expended, and this figure of $75,000,000 represents the amount repaid by the settlers on the 25 or 26 projects scattered throughout 15 or 16 Western States. Do you say now that they do not repay? The bureau told me this morning they had repaid $75,000,000. I then asked how much of the $225,000,000 was not yet due and they replied $118,000,000 is not yet due. You do not expect a man who owes you a note to pay it before it is due nor condemn him if he does not pay it before it is due.

The next question was in regard to the charge off of $12,500,000 and the amount suspended $14,500,000. This latter may finally become a charge off—it may or it may not.

Then I said, "How much are our people on all of these 25 or 26 projects delinquent for everything, including construction and operation and maintenance," and the accountant said, "$4,500,000." There is the whole picture. Reclamationists are 2 per cent delinquent.

In regard to the charge off, there have been mistakes made sometimes. As I said in the beginning, there are 3,000,000 acres within the outlines of this project, but our engineers have been very cautious and have cut down and cut out and cut out wherever they thought it was not the best of land until they have taken out nearly 1,200,000 acres.

In the earliest projects, 25 years ago, they did not always do this. They went ahead and provided water and assessed those lands and then there came a time when nobody could make them pay. Because the Government men made the mistake and not the settler, it was thought by the Government itself the proper thing to mark that off. I will say that I was on about 2,000 acres in a splendid project, but there happened to be some outcroppings of rock, rock as big as this table, and you could almost walk from one to another over acres of the land, and still the people on that project to-day are paying something over $50 an acre as repayment charges. It was not their mistake. They are entitled to the charge-off on that land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. In connection with the statement the gentleman just made, of course that expenditure of $225,000,000 was from the reclamation fund, while the appropriation under the pending bill is to be from the Treasury; but our chances of getting the money repaid may be judged from our past experience. The gentleman shows that $31,500,000 out of $225,000,000 is either delinquent, suspended, or charged off and that $118,000,000 is not yet due.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And $75,000,000 already repaid.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; how much of that $118,000,000 not now due is extended; that is to say, has become due and through relief acts of Congress the time of payment has been extended?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I do not think any of it. I think this other figure represents that amount.

Mr. CRAMTON. No; the gentleman knows that of that $118,000,000 a material portion is money that would to-day be due if the original time of payment had not been extended.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. You mean under the original law of 15 or 20 years ago?

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, under different ones.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I mean under the laws that exist to-day this is what the bureau tells me is due.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; $4,500,000 is what is really delinquent.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. But there is a large amount that became due and relief acts extended the time of payment.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But only to give more time. They are not relieved from payment.

Mr. SCHAFER. Even if there is a portion of that $118,000,000 delinquent, this Government has seen fit to relieve taxpayers in other sections of the country of one hundred times that amount.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I thank the gentleman for that contribution. A gentleman from Massachusetts suggested to me that we have been pretty generous to the West. I said, do you have in mind that the Government loaned to Massachusetts 92 years ago a sum which, if figured at 5 per cent, would now amount to $75,000,000? They distributed it from the Federal Treasury 92 years ago, and it has never been repaid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is not it true that the mistakes that were made by the Government in handling projects 25 years ago, that were put into operation while we were learning how to conduct them, are being applied in the way of safeguards so those mistakes will not be repeated?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; that is true. I have read that to develop the State of Illinois a land grant was made to the Illinois Central Railroad in the early days. What did Congress do? They gave every alternative section in a strip of land 32 miles wide, 16 miles on each side of the railroad for 300 miles. Can you estimate the value of that contribution—try it?

Mr. MILLER. And it did develop the State of Illinois?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It did develop the State of Illinois. I can not say in regard to other States, except that we know through Kansas and Nebraska and other Northwestern States the same thing was done by the Government to help develop those States. So far as I know there has been nothing commensurate in value done for the development of the State of Washington. There has been something in a small way, but we are striving to pay our own bills. We are asking you simply to give us the opportunity to develop.

Now, going back to the loans that were made to the States. If they were calculated at 5 per cent interest up to the present time, roughly speaking, they would amount to $1,750,000,000. Not one dollar has been repaid by any one of the 26 States that benefited by those loans in 1836.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. What were those loans made for?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It was money that came from public-land sales. It accumulated in the Treasury and they said we will divide it among all the States in the Union at that time. The State of New York received something over $4,000,000, which, figured up at 5 per cent to the present time, would amount to $256,000,000.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The State of New York pays almost one-fifth of all the improvements, and we are generously minded——

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; but New York City to-day would be a little village down on the lower end of Manhattan Island if it had not been for the back country. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Can the gentleman give us the information as to how much has heretofore been expended in the State of Washington for reclamation from the reclamation fund—money loaned without interest? How much has been spent?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. There has been expended on the Yakima project, which is included in this, a total of about $14,000,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. That does not include the Kittitas and other works—would not it amount to $30,000,000?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Not so much as that; about $20,000,000. I thought the gentleman was going to ask how much was loaned to the State of Michigan. I have figured that up and it runs a little over $18,000,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman is figuring interest, whereas the custom in the West has been not to pay interest.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I know the gentleman will yield long enough for me to say that New York makes less objection to expenditures of this kind than probably any other State in the Union.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I appreciate the fact that New York is a great and generous city. Our merchants go to New York twice a year to buy practically everything they sell in their department stores. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Congress, I understand that within the next few days the House will be considering the matter of flood control. A very important phase of flood control to this country, a phase that is just as interesting and necessary to the entire country as any other phase of flood control, is that in controlling the floods on the Mississippi we should also control the floods on its tributaries. It is for the purpose of talking to you concerning the tributaries that I have asked for a few minutes this afternoon. First, I want to devote a few words to the discussion which has been going on throughout the country and in the newspapers relative to the "pork" that is in flood control. As to that, if there is any "pork" in the flood control bill now pending before this House, it is not in that part referring to the tributaries. If you will read the bill that is now pending you will find that section 10 is the only one that refers to the tributaries, and it simply provides for an appropriation of $5,000,000, to be expended through the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, with which to make a survey and report to Congress and to the Government and to the people of the country what can be done to stop the floods on the tributaries. There is not in any way another thing in that measure which binds or obligates the Government of the United States to expend another dime of any kind on the tributaries. After the report is made, if the officials of the Government find that it is in the interest of the Nation that the floods on these tributaries be controlled, then and not until then is there an intimation of expending a further sum on the tributaries than the $5,000,000 referred to in section 10. That being the case, I am wondering where the intimation or the suggestion could arise that the tributary part of the flood control bill bore even any earmarks of pork.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. SANDLIN. Is it not a fact that this Congress has already authorized an appropriation of $7,000,000 for that purpose and that there was carried in the Army appropriation bill an appropriation of a million and a half dollars for this very purpose? This is simply a repetition of what has already been done by the Congress.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. That is true. It is simply a repetition, and increasing the amount of the appropriation so that it may become available, and that the work may be done at the earliest possible moment, as is necessary. Not only that. You ask me why we of the States living on these tributaries do not do this work and make these surveys. The answer is that these rivers are interstate, these rivers are controlled by the Government. A very considerable part of many of them is navigable.

Mr. GARBER. And is not the answer, the common-sense solution of the control of the floods on the Mississippi, to begin at the source of the water flow instead of beginning at the mouth of the river?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I agree with the gentleman entirely and say to him, as I said once before on the floor of this House, that to start flood control on the lower Mississippi without taking into consideration the tributaries is like starting to bore an oil well from the bottom up. But, Mr. Chairman, continuing my line of thought as to why we do not do this and why the Government should make this survey, let me call attention again to the fact that these rivers are interstate. Part of these rivers are navigable. My State of Oklahoma, located in the center, practically, of the Arkansas River, has for six years been spending its own money and seeking projects to control those floods, but it is an interstate matter. If you control the floods in Oklahoma according to our plan, we would probably control them in a manner that would do an injury to the other States that are interested the same as we are. Consequently, it is a national situation. The Government is the only agency that can legally do so and bind all the States. It is the only agency that can take the initiative by making this survey and tell us of the flood-suffering tributary States what can be done to give us the relief that we are entitled to. But there is not in this bill, and I have never heard any person interested in flood control on the tributaries, even suggest that after this survey is made and after it is found feasible, as we believe it will be found, that we of the tributary States expect the Government, or expect to ask the Government to bear the full share of the burden. But that is a matter that will be solved after the report is made.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I did not understand the gentleman to say that the tributaries would not make any contribution, did I?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I said I had never heard any intimation from anybody interested in the tributary States that we would ask the Government to bear the full burden.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. Before the gentleman gets away from that section of the bill that provides for surveys, I call his attention to this. The survey that is provided in this bill is the same work that is provided for in the rivers and harbors bill of last year, with two or three rivers added.

I have information from the Chief of Engineers that it will take, probably, in some instances, as high as 5 and perhaps 10 years to complete these surveys. On the Arkansas River alone last year in Kansas, in Oklahoma, and in Arkansas we suffered from those floods a loss of $58,000,000. On the Arkansas River during the past week, on the White River, and on the Ouachita River, and on the St. Francis River they have suffered damages to the extent of untold thousands upon thousands. If you wait for the completion of these surveys for the control of those large tributaries you might just as well cast the fortunes of those people to the wolves. Everything they have by that time will be destroyed. The fact is, the provision for these surveys in the pending bill that passed the Senate and the one that has passed out of the committee are mere guesses.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. It may be true that they are mere guesses. But this fact remains, that under the present conditions out of the river and harbor appropriation we have $60,000 allotted to surveying the St. Francis River and the Arkansas River, which is 1,465 miles long, and what we are endeavoring to do, or rather what we are having to accept, is to try to raise this appropriation so that sufficient funds can be provided at least to make this survey and make it at once.

Mr. RAGON. What you want is a flood-control-project survey, not associated with this river and harbor bill, which provides for power and irrigation and various other things.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes; I thank the gentleman for bringing that point out. I thought of it a moment ago. The river and harbor act, it is true, makes appropriations for navigation and power. What this amendment means, in addition to that, is that we will have a survey that will bring to Congress flood-control projects in the immediate emergency and necessity.

Reverting to the necessity of flood control on the tributaries, let me call your attention to the fact that in 1927 the losses were just as great proportionately on those tributaries as on the lower Mississippi, because these tributaries furnish the flood waters that make the floods in the lower Mississippi.

What were some of those losses, Mr. Chairman? As to these losses on tributaries I am speaking only of the Arkansas, but what I say of the Arkansas is unquestionably true of the rest of the tributaries. Let us see something of the losses on one of the many tributaries. The flood losses in 1927 on the Arkansas, which starts down in Arkansas, in Arkansas City [indicating on the map], where it empties into the Mississippi, and runs up through the State of Arkansas 370 miles, and 340 miles in Oklahoma, and 400 miles in Kansas, and 350 miles in Colorado—in the State of Kansas for 1927 the flood losses were $12,000,000; in the State of Oklahoma the losses were $20,000,000; in the State of Arkansas, only figuring down to Pine Bluff, which is 100 miles above the mouth of this river, the loss was $26,000,000, making a total loss on this one tributary last year in the three States, to say nothing of the losses in Colorado, of $58,000,000. Not only that, but on this Arkansas River, starting in Colorado, are the cities of Pueblo, La Junta, and Canon City. Then in the State of Kansas are Garden City, Dodge, Wichita, Hutchinson, and Arkansas City; in the State of Oklahoma, Tulsa, Sand Springs, and Muskogee. In the State of Arkansas, down to Pine Bluff, are Fort Smith, Dardanell, Little Rock, and Pine Bluff. These cities run in population from a few thousand to 150,000 people; and the losses to the cities in many other ways besides actual physical damages are in no way included in the figures I have given you.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, flood control on the tributaries is just as much a national problem as it is on the lower Mississippi. [Applause.] And there can be no justification of a measure that will take the taxes of the people of the United States for flood control on the lower Mississippi and leave a large part of the flood sufferers on these tributaries to drown. The people of the 31 States through which these tributaries run and in which they do their damage should protest an act of this kind, and any Member of Congress living in a State through which these tributaries flow who would vote to bring about a condition of that kind is doing an injury to the people of his own district and to his own State.

Now, on this problem of flood control on the tributaries I want to talk to my good friends from New England and from the East. You may think, if you have not analyzed the question, that you are not much interested in our flood problem. But you are, and you are deeply interested. I will tell you what I mean.

Statistics disclose that in that part of the United States west of the Mississippi and in that part south of the Ohio, which is the country through which these tributaries flow, we have an annual production of raw materials of $17,000,000,000 and we have a manufacturers' pay roll of only $2,000,000,000. In the other part of the country, in which live my eastern and northern and New England friends to whom I am appealing now, you have a raw production of $7,000,000,000 and a manufacturers' pay roll of $17,000,000,000. A large percentage of the products of this tributary country is the produce of the farm. So what is the situation? You of the East and of the North manufacture what we out in the Mississippi Valley use.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. The section of the country to which the gentleman has referred produces 70 per cent of the manufactured products of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman means the North and East?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. That is true. Your factories make our clothing, our hardware, our farm machinery, our boots and shoes, and the hundreds of other articles that we of the tributary country must purchase.

Let us look at this in another way. In the State of Oklahoma last year 762,000 acres of land were under flood on tributaries. That means, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that at least 10,000 farms in that State suffered by reason of these floods. Now, what did that mean to the people to whom I am appealing right now? It meant this, that the purchasing power of at least 50,000 people in the State of Oklahoma alone was destroyed for about 18 months. Now, you are our manufacturers. In the cities of New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Detroit, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and other big eastern markets are the jobbers who supply us with the materials of which I am speaking. So what is the effect as to tributary floods on the people of this part of the country? It is this: When the buying power of the people on these tributaries is destroyed—and when it is destroyed it is for about 18 months—you people feel the effects of it the same as we do. I dare say that as we talk of the unemployed in this country to-day, that if you will check up on your mills and on your wholesale houses you will find that quite a bit of this unemployment is reflected in the fact that the purchasing power of the people on the tributary rivers of the United States was destroyed for over 18 months in 1927.

Not only that, but, my friends, you folks own our railroads. If you do not own them physically, you own their bonds, and what happens when millions of tons of freight is destroyed by the ravaging floods on the tributaries? You do not clip the coupons on the railroad bonds which you own.

Not only that, but the people in this eastern and northern country to whom I am appealing for the tributaries have been there a long time. Your pioneering days are past; you have been thrifty; you have got money, and in your country you own the mortgages on the farms of these pioneer farmers that are being flooded out on these tributaries. So when the floods ravage those farms, when they wash away the soil, and when they decrease the value of those farm lands your people suffer as well as we.

Not only that, but in this country through which these tributaries flow and do their damage is the bread basket of the United States, and whenever thousands of acres of wheat, corn, and cotton are drowned out the people of your country suffer as we do by reason of the diminution of these foodstuffs. Not only in that line, but when through these floods the foodstuff is destroyed and there is kept off of the market millions of pounds of pork and beef it is your people who feel it as well as we in the tributary country.

When you of the Northeast and the East come to us of this stricken valley and ask for measures to protect your coast in the way of coast guards, fortifications, battleships, lighthouses, and anything else that you feel necessary, we have never and will never hesitate to, without questioning you, acquiesce in giving to you everything necessary.

Not only that, but out in that vast country, running from northern Arkansas up to the Canadian border, is a great empire within itself, if only there was water to enrich it and make it come forth with crops as it would. And along that line I want to repeat what the gentleman from New York said a few minutes ago, and that is that in considering these matters we should also look to the future. If these tributaries are properly controlled, water will be stored at their headwaters through reservoirs, and as a result of it there will be created thousands of homes for people who would be much better off to-day if they had an outlet out of the crowded cities and the crowded communities of other parts of this country, and that would have no effect upon the present condition of the farm situation for the reason, as in the case of the basin just spoken of, that it will be years before this can be accomplished, and with the increase in population which is natural this country must look for an outlet for these people sooner or later.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal said about the cost of flood control. I am not going to discuss that with the exception of saying this, that when we entered into the construction of the Panama Canal project we did not know what it was going to cost; it was a national necessity; we did it and we have never had cause to regret that we did it. Whatever adequate flood control shall cost the safety, peace, and prosperity of the Nation demands it. It is a national necessity, and like the Panama Canal we must meet the emergency and do it. But here again I call your attention to the fact that so far as the tributaries are concerned, we are only asking for $5,000,000, and that the Nation is not placed under any further obligations. I call your attention to the fact that when $25,000,000 was asked to purchase the Mall property and beautify Washington we of the tributaries voted for it, and our people will contribute their part of the taxes. When the people of Washington suggested four and one-half million dollars to build a roadway to Washington's Tomb, we of the tributaries supported it and our people pay their part of the taxes. When the Government asked for millions upon millions of dollars with which to build buildings in Washington, we of the tributaries supported it and our people are contributing their part of the taxes; and then when we ask for a paltry appropriation of $5,000,000 with which to provide plans for preserving the peace, prosperity, and happiness of the people on these tributaries in the matter of flood control, it is somewhat disgusting to us that the newspapers and others who have not analyzed and considered this matter so far as the tributaries are concerned cry out "Pork barrel!"

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is true that another section of this bill provides for a study of their reservoir system of controlling floods; but it carries with it a mighty little expenditure of money unless the Government shall decide that this plan is feasible. Let us see for a minute about reservoirs, both from a national and tributary standpoint.

The Army engineers tell us they would have little, if any, effect upon the Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. It would be presumptuous for me to enter into an argument with these engineers; but other engineers, probably just as capable, say that reservoirs will have a decided effect upon the floods of the Mississippi.

I pointed out to you a while ago that the losses on the Arkansas in Oklahoma and Arkansas last year were $36,000,000. Where did the floods come from that caused this loss? Records show that they came down the tributaries to the Arkansas from the States of Kansas, Mississippi, Oklahoma, and then into the Mississippi.

Estimates which have been furnished to the Committee on Flood Control show that the building of three reservoirs in the country where this flood arose—mind you, statistics show that 25 per cent of the flood waters at Arkansas City, Ark., where the Arkansas empties into the Mississippi, came out of that river, and we have offered evidence before the Committee on Flood Control that three reservoirs in the country where this flood arose on the Arkansas could be built at a cost of $21,000,000, and would have prohibited this $36,000,000 loss in the States of Arkansas and Oklahoma.

Had these reservoirs been there they would have been of permanent and lasting benefit as well as have prohibited the loss referred to.

But what of the effect on the lower Mississippi? Engineers tell me that they will have a great effect. For your benefit I submit a statement from one who has given study to flood control:

> The 1927 flood in the Arkansas River constituted about twelve-twentieths of the measured flood flow of the Mississippi below the confluence. In any event, it was half of it. The western edge of the storm area was just west of Wichita. In the storm area, on the upper Arkansas, there was projected by the Oklahoma commission and the interstate commission, reservoir capacity of about three and one-third million acre-feet of water, at a cost of slightly over $21,000,000.
> The peak flow at Fort Smith for a few hours was 714,000 cubic feet of water per second. The bank capacity of the Arkansas is given as 370,000 cubic feet of water per second. The difference of 344,000 cubic feet of water per second is the overflow at peak. The reservoir capacity above given would have skimmed off the top 400,000 cubic feet of water per second for about four and one-half days, or the top 300,000 cubic feet of water per second, bringing it down to harmlessness for about six days. Of course, the peak only lasted a few hours, so it may be reasonably figured that it would have kept the flood flow of the river down to bank limits at all times, and there would have been no destruction in the Arkansas Valley, and the injury below would have been greatly diminished.

Not only this, but if you will read the report of the Army engineers you will discover that General Jadwin said in his report:

> Many reservoirs on the tributaries, which would be of little help to the Mississippi, will be of great value in the control of floods on the tributaries as well as for other uses.

This being true, I ask you why not build them and give the tributaries the protection General Jadwin suggests these reservoirs will offer? And, not only that, if we find they will be of benefit to the tributaries, then we know they will be of benefit on the lower Mississippi. Why should we, when there is little, if any, expense attached, refuse to give this plan consideration? In this consideration it is not altogether improbable that we might find a better and a cheaper way to control the Mississippi.

In conclusion let me say, Mr. Chairman, that everyone admits that flood control on the Mississippi is a national problem. If on the Mississippi, why not on the tributaries?

How can any Member justify a vote protecting the people of the lower Mississippi and neglecting the same kind of sufferers on the tributaries? Is this to be a divided and sectional nation on this great question?

Is there a Member of Congress living on a tributary or in a State through which these tributaries flow who is going to cast his vote on this measure to give relief to other people and neglect his own people?

If you live in a State where one of these tributaries flows, whether it touches your district or not, it does injury to every citizen of that State, for as these floods rage, as land values decrease, business in your State, whether the tributaries touch you or not, is injured, land values reduced, and taxation on every citizen of the State raised to just that extent. Consequently, every man and women in the Congress from a State that one of these tributaries touches is just as much under obligation to see to it that the Government treats the tributaries fairly as though he lived directly on that river.

Mr. EVANS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. EVANS of California. Where would the gentleman draw the line of demarcation between Government control and local control? The gentleman says the tributaries are entitled to the same consideration as the Mississippi, but there must be a line of demarcation somewhere, otherwise we would put all the control in the hands of the Government.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The control of all these rivers is under the Government. That is what this survey will bring out, if you will only give it to us.

Mr. EVANS of California. Where is the line of demarcation?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. That is what this survey will bring out. That is one reason we are asking that you make this study and help us to formulate plans.

We are only asking for the small sum of $5,000,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, with which to do this work, which, as a matter of fact, affects every one of you. I can not believe that we of the 31 States of the Mississippi Valley are going to be sent home from this Congress and told by this Congress and by this administration that you have no interest whatever in our problems. Adverse action as to the tributaries would mean just that and that alone.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I believe the gentleman ought to change his statement, because the $5,000,000 we are asking is for surveys.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. And the gentleman stated that is all we ask.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I say that is all we are asking in this bill.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I do not want the gentleman to leave the impression that is all we are going to ask, because the tributaries are as important as the main line, and we have got to have them taken care of at some future time.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I stated at the beginning of my talk, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, that all we are asking now is this survey, and then the part that the State and the Government are to play will be a matter for later consideration.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. There is another item in the bill that pertains to the tributaries which I do not think the gentleman would want taken out, and that is an appropriation of $5,000,000 for emergency work on the tributaries. This item is in a separate section of the bill and it is one I do not think the gentleman would want taken out of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Of course, I have been discussing flood control on the tributaries. [Applause.]

[Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, a few days ago my good friend from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] undertook by some index numbers and some hypothesis and a great deal of optimism to show that the agricultural interests of this country are greatly improved under the tariff on agricultural products.

A little later the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] made an extended speech on the floor of the House, advocating not only a tariff upon agricultural products of this Nation, but what a wonderful benefit it had been to the American farmer.

Of course, the gentleman from Texas did not make that speech for the purpose of giving information to the House or the country or home consumption. He made it solely for the purpose of its being circulated in the district of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] in order to embarrass him in his fight at the coming election.

I do not hold any brief for Mr. GARNER; he does not need any. He is able to take care of himself. But I want to say, in passing, that there has not been a man on the floor of this House since I have been a Member of it that has rendered more able service and patriotic service to his country than JOHN GARNER, of Texas. [Applause.]

I saw him take the lead a year or so ago, when the Mellon tax plan was up, the sole purpose of which was to relieve the immensely rich of the country, giving no relief to the little fellow, the poor fellow—I saw Mr. GARNER wage such a brilliant fight that he not only whipped the Secretary of the Treasury, but by his superior ability and leadership in that fight he made it so effective that the majority of the Ways and Means Committee did not vote out the Mellon tax plan. [Applause.]

I imagine that when JOHN GARNER'S constituents read the speech made for the purpose of embarrassing him the constituency that knows him, that believes in him, and that delights to honor him, will make his majority in that election a good deal bigger than the majority the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] will receive in his district when it comes. [Applause.]

Why did he try to beat John GARNER? Because Mr. GARNER had the temerity to stand here and make a fight to prevent the repeal of the inheritance tax, thereby compelling the immensely rich in this country to bear their proportion of the taxes, so that the children of these rich people whom the Government has protected while they were making their fortunes pay a small per cent of it to this Government. And yet, because JOHN GARNER proposed to keep on the statute books of our Government a law where they shall contribute a proportion of that to defray the expenses of the Federal Government, when they are allowed $100,000 exemption before they pay a cent—because JOHN GARNER has waged successfully the fight, this lobby in Washington, through the instrumentality of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] had him make that speech for the purpose of going into JOHN GARNER'S district.

I want to show you something about the tariff on agricultural products. Of course, anybody that knows any economics at all knows that you can not make a tariff effective on any product where a surplus is raised. We produce a surplus of agricultural products in this country to such an extent that the surplus controls and makes the world price.

You gentlemen on the Republican side of the House admit that it is not effective because you are trying to pass the McNary-Haugen bill, or a debenture plan, in order to make the tariff law effective.

I maintain that the tariff on wheat is a miller's tariff. I maintain it is put in the McNary-Haugen bill for the protection of the miller and not the farmer. I will show you in a minute.

Why, for the last year, notwithstanding the tariff of 42 cents a bushel, wheat sold higher in Winnipeg than in Minnesota over half the time.

Under section 313 of the Fordney-McCumber bill there is the drawback provision. Under that it provides that the big millers, who mill what is called in bond, who import their wheat from Canada, the hard wheat for the purpose of blending, in order to get the benefit of the drawback they have to mix at least 30 per cent or more of American wheat with the Canadian wheat and grind it into flour and its by-products and export the flour and its by-products. I want to give you some statistics, because I got these from the Tariff Commission. The tariff on wheat for 1922 and 1923, under the original Fordney-McCumber Act, was 30 cents a bushel. In 1924, under the flexible provisions of that tariff act, the President increased the tariff on wheat to 42 cents a bushel. That has been in effect since 1924 to 1927, inclusive. I want to show you how much benefit the millers get under this drawback provision.

If they import a hundred thousand bushels of Canadian wheat to-day, when it comes to the port of entry, they pay the 42 cents a bushel tariff; but when they turn around and mix with that hundred thousand bushels of Canadian wheat as much as 30,000 bushels of American wheat and grind it into flour, and its by-products, and export it, then as soon as that operation is over, under this provision of the bill, they go right back to the customhouse and draw down 99 cents on every dollar they paid in tariff in order to get Canadian wheat in here. The littler millers who import the Canadian wheat and use it domestically do not get that benefit. They pay their straight 42 cents a bushel. I am inserting here statistics prepared by the Tariff Commission showing the number of bushels of wheat from 1922 to 1927, inclusive, imported by the small millers upon which duty was paid and the amount of duty paid each year. In the next column it is shown the amount of wheat imported each year by the big millers for milling in bond, and also shows the amount of tariff each year that the big millers drew out of the Treasury as a drawback, which I am sure will be not only interesting but somewhat a revelation to the wheat growers of the United States, and I hope will be impressive on some of the would-be farm leaders of the House who supported the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill with this drawback provision in it. This statement is as follows:

Imports of wheat into the United States
(Act of 1922)

Calendar year	Duty-paid wheat		Imported free in bond for milling and export as flour
	Quantity	Duties paid	Quantity	99 per cent of estimated duties

Let us see how it has been working during the last seven years. The little miller and the other fellows who imported Canadian wheat for domestic purposes imported in those seven years 20,770,127 bushels of wheat, upon which they paid 30 cents a bushel for two years—1922 and 1923—and 42 cents a bushel for 1924, 1925, 1926, and 1927, and by reason of that law these little fellows paid tariff into the Federal Treasury a total of $6,526,226, and they did not get any drawback.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But if they had shipped it out, they could have gotten the money.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Oh, yes; but they did not ship it out. They are not so fortunate.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But they are in exactly the same situation in that respect as the big miller.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman voted for that, and, as I understand, he is for that provision?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I want to get this clearly in the RECORD, that the little man and the big man are treated exactly the same.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman indorses that provision, does he?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I have given my answer that they are treated the same.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Well, I would not flinch; I would say yes or no. The gentleman did vote for it, did he not?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The record will reveal.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Then I now reveal the RECORD, and I say that the gentleman did. Let us see how the big miller was treated under the drawback provision. Understand it was claimed that this tariff on wheat was put there for the benefit and protection of the American wheat farmer, and not the big miller. On those 20,000,000 bushels of wheat the little fellow paid a tariff of over $6,000,000. Yet in those same seven years the big millers who imported Canadian wheat for purposes of later export, imported 60,488,814 bushels of wheat. If they had paid the 42 cents tariff like the little fellows paid, they would have paid into the Treasury of the United States $23,706,794.28; but did they? No; they took advantage of this drawback provision, and instead of paying $23,000,000 and odd into the Treasury, they drew back 99 cents on every dollar that they paid in the first place, and actually put into the Treasury only $237,267.94.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What would the gentleman do? Move the mills to Canada? Is that what he wants to do?

Mr. KINCHELOE. No. I will tell the gentleman what I would do. If these big millers did not have this blessed privilege of the drawback which your party put in there for the benefit of the big miller, they would not have gone to Canada to get these 60,000,000 and odd bushels of hard wheat and paid the 42-cent duty on it. They would have gotten it from the farmers of the Northwest in the United States who raise that kind of wheat. North Dakota produced an annual average during the last five years, 105,000,000 bushels of hard wheat a year. That is just as good wheat as the Canadian wheat.

Montana produces about 70,000,000 bushels a year of hard wheat, which is just as good as the Canadian wheat. Western Minnesota produces 25,000,000 bushels of hard wheat every year. So we have a tariff bill to "protect" the American wheat farmer, but it has this drawback provision in it for the benefit of the large miller. If that drawback provision had never been in the law, there would have been over 60,000,000 bushels of wheat in the last seven years taken out of the bins of the American farmer who grows hard wheat, instead of out of the bins of the Canadian farmer, and you would have had that much less surplus of wheat to dump on the world's market.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. What becomes of all of those millions of bushels of hard wheat produced in this country? Are they not all consumed in this country?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Certainly not. We produce in this country over 800,000,000 bushels of wheat a year.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. What becomes of the hard wheat?

Mr. KINCHELOE. We export a large part of it. We produce 800,000,000 bushels of wheat a year, and we consume about 600,000,000 bushels of wheat. We sow about 50,000,000 bushels of wheat. Therefore, you have an average surplus that goes into the world market of 150,000,000 bushels of wheat every year.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But it is not hard wheat.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Absolutely; hard wheat in the same proportion as soft wheat. Here is your millers' tariff, here is the tariff that you put on the statute books and that you are now acknowledging is not effective, because you want the McNary-Haugen bill or the debenture plan in order to make the tariff effective on this proposition. Therefore, it is a millers' proposition. Talk about protecting the surplus and the American farmer! Those big fellows imported 60,000,000 bushels of wheat into this country upon which they paid only 1 cent a bushel, while the little fellow paid over $6,000,000 duty on 20,000,000 bushels of wheat.

When you say it is for the benefit of the American farmer I want to refer you to these figures, and I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] will send it to the wheat growers of Texas and let them say what a wonderful benefit this tariff is to the American wheat grower; and if he did that he would have a harder time in explaining the speech he made the other day than he had a year ago when he undertook to explain and defend himself against the onslaught of JOHN GARNER. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana has used one hour and five minutes.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to enter into a lengthy or detailed discussion as to the necessity for legislation looking to the relief of agriculture, but will ask you to agree with me in the statement that the industry as a whole is in rather a deplorable condition and that there is almost a universal demand for legislation that will assist in restoring and maintaining a successful agriculture.

However, in order to first determine whether the legislation I am proposing (H. R. 10562) will meet the requirements and satisfy the demand I think it proper to make a hurried review of the situation, give my interpretation of facts, and submit a legislative program as a solution of the problem. That is, we will endeavor to locate the trouble with agriculture, determine the cause or causes thereof, and then suggest a remedy.

Such a procedure is in harmony with the practice of the physician who listens to the complaint of his patient, locates the trouble, determines the cause, and recommends treatment for the removal thereof.

The outstanding complaint coming to Congress from the agricultural interests is that the margin between the costs of production and prices obtained for farm products is too narrow and the net income is so small that farmers are unable to develop or maintain a standard of living in keeping with that enjoyed by persons engaged in other occupations or industries. As a matter of fact, it is alleged and proven that the margin in most cases is entirely wiped out and the returns on capital invested and labor expended have been so small that hundreds and thousands of farmers have been compelled to surrender their homes and go into bankruptcy.

Another complaint is to the effect that the spread between the price received by the producer and that paid by the consumer is too wide and that the present methods of distribution operate as an unwarranted burden upon both the producer and the consumer. Coupled with these complaints is the demand that the margin should be increased in the first place and decreased in the second. Some contend that the only way to widen the margin in the first instance is to increase the price, while others say that it can be done only by decreasing the cost of production. My position is that we can do both, and the plan I propose to submit for your consideration contemplates both a decrease in the cost of production as well as an increase in the price to the producer. It further contemplates a reduction in the cost of distribution which will lessen the spread between the price received by the producer and that paid by the consumer which, in effect, should increase the price received by the former and decrease the price paid by the latter.

I call attention to this feature of the proposed plan at the outset, because some of the plans submitted to Congress so far are calling for legislation designed primarily to increase prices only; and in this connection I wish to make it clear that I am not referring to this difference in a spirit of criticism, because I firmly believe that prices for farm crops generally are too low. However, it should be remembered that prices are high or low, according as they appear above or below the cost of production. For instance, 15 or 20 years ago the wheat farmer of the West could have grown rich with wheat selling for $1.25 per bushel, and the cotton farmer of the South could have done the same thing with cotton selling at 15 cents per pound, but with such prices to-day, with increased cost of production, these farmers can hardly make a living. At that time such prices would have been considered high, but now they are said to be low, even below the cost of production.

While this is a most important phase of the problem, we should not lose sight of that feature charged with the responsibility of decreasing the margin or spread between the price received by the producer and that paid by the consumer, for it has been estimated that the cost of farm products to the consumer, over and above that received by the producer, exceeds the amount received by the farmer in the first place. For instance, it was stated at the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture that for the 17 standard food products consumers pay $22,500,000,000, of which the farmers received only $7,500,000,000. In other words only about one-third of the price paid by the consumer is received by the producer. It appears therefore from the complaints made and the evidence submitted that the real trouble with agriculture is that the margin between the cost of production and the price received by the farmer for his crop is too narrow, and that the margin between the price he receives and the price paid by the consumer is too wide.

If it is agreed that this is the trouble, we proceed next to look for the cause. It is held by many that the price received by the farmer in the first place is too low because the quantity he has for sale at any one time is out of proportion to the demand, or that there is a surplus over and above that actually needed by the consuming public, and this surplus depresses the price unnecessarily low. Then it is said that the spread between the price the farmer receives and that which the consumer pays is too wide because the selling agencies, the system of marketing, the transportation costs, and other costs of distribution are excessive and too expensive.

Now, if the narrow margin between the cost of production and the price received by the farmer for his crop is caused by a surplus, some plan should be devised for removing that cause, and if the wide margin between the price received by the farmer and that paid by the producer is caused by a vicious system of marketing and distribution, some plan should be devised to remove this cause and substitute therefor a system that will be most economic in its operations. But whatever is done should be in keeping with the constitutional requirements and well-established principles of our Government. If I were so inclined, I might take up the bill that has been reported by the Agricultural Committee and think I could show where it will not meet the acid test of these requirements, but it is not my purpose to criticize any other plan for farm relief, but to suggest what I consider a superior one both from the standpoint of economy and successful operation.

However, before going into the details of the plan I have to offer let me suggest that the solution of the agricultural problem from a legislative standpoint will be arrived at very much in the same manner and upon the same principles that the individual farmer successfully solves the problems of his individual farm; that is, a successful legislative program will be reached, or the problem from a governmental standpoint will be solved, very much in the same manner and upon the same principles followed by successful enterprises in the solution of their problems. To illustrate, there are a number of farmers as well as other business men who are Members of Congress. Suppose you are a successful farmer and you are thinking about enlarging your farming operations, or if you are thinking about adding a new type of farming to your existing operations, the first thing you will do is to make careful observations and records of your various existing farming operations to see how these operations and the proposed new one will dovetail into each other; to see whether the proposed operation will be a liability or an asset to the others; to see whether or not the cost of one operation will assist in defraying the expense of the other; to see whether the capital invested in one can in any way be used to supplement the investment required in the other; to see whether the labor or machinery used in your existing operations would be suitable for the proposed one, so that you would be able to secure maximum production at the minimum cost.

I am sure you will agree with me in the statement that enlarged activities of any successful business enterprise are generally arranged so that their operations will be coordinated and dovetail into each other, so that maximum net production of the whole with the minimum cost may be obtained. I pause here long enough to inquire, Why should not the same principles apply in a legislative program? Therefore, in proposing legislation for the relief of agriculture I submit that we should first cast about or look around and see whether there are any existing governmental agencies that may be utilized for accomplishing the purposes contemplated before we attempt to create new, independent, and untried agencies to accomplish the same end. Common sense, business sense, horse sense, sound political sense, yea, dollars and cents, all demand such an inquiry.

I think we are generally agreed on two things in connection with the farm-relief problem; one is the handling of surplus crops, or that of surplus control, and the other is economic marketing, generally recognized as cooperative marketing. However, I take the position that stabilized production is just as important as either or both of the other factors combined, for when we stabilize production, surplus control follows as a natural consequence, and without some regulation or control of production the surplus-control idea will become nothing more than sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. But I will speak of this in more detail later on and direct my remarks now to the practical operations of the bill, although it will be impossible within the time allowed to go into all the details.

In the first place we have the board quite similar to that provided for in most of the other farm-relief plans. It determines when there is a surplus of a crop and whether under the provisions of the bill the commodity cooperative association is entitled to advances, as provided therein, the conditions being that the producers have conformed to the spirit of the law with reference to acreage, that there is a surplus which has depressed or threatens to depress the price below the cost of production, and that there is a duly organized commodity cooperative association of producers to handle such surplus.

The board then arranges with the existing financial agencies of the Government, coupled with the use of the revolving fund provided for in the bill, to advance the producers, through their association, the market value of the crop to be removed from the market and stored. The crop is held until the emergency has passed and the price has reached such a point that the crop can be sold without loss to anyone; and in case there is a profit after insurance, storage, and other costs have been paid, it shall be distributed among the members of the association or according to the regulations of the association. Farmers will clamor to join the cooperatives after one successful season.

Of course, in these operations the board will have not only the assistance of the financing agencies of the Government, but will have the cooperation of the Federal warehouse system, the cooperative marketing system, the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the Extension Service, and other governmental agencies. In other words, there will be a coordination of the efforts of these various agencies, and in addition to the authority they now have they will be clothed and charged with a more definite responsibility in the discharge of the work assigned to them.

You all understand that surplus crops can not be handled efficiently and effectively without proper and sufficient finance, adequate storage facilities, and scientific marketing; and that the maximum success can not be obtained without the coordination of these agencies, coupled with the least possible administrative cost. In this connection I wish to illustrate the operations of the bill I am submitting by the chart and the classifications on the next page.

SURPLUS CONTROL

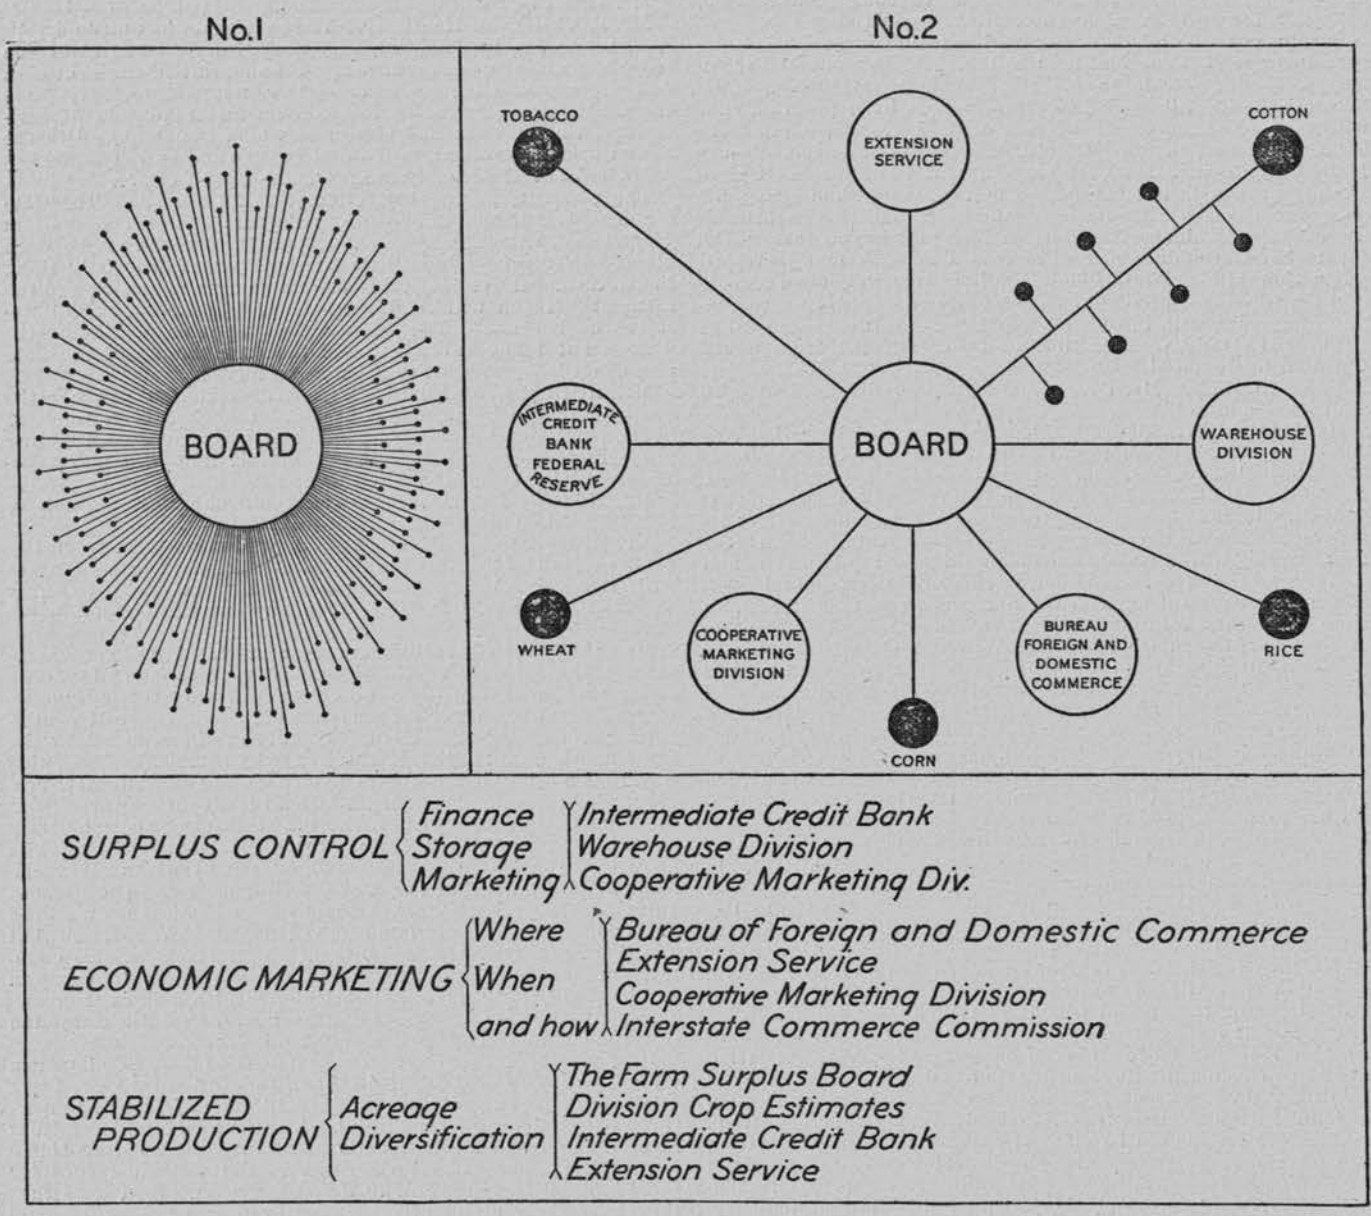
It will be observed from the illustration that the intermediate credit bank, the Federal reserve banks, and the revolving fund provided for in this bill furnish ample financial arrangements for handling the surplus of any crop with a minimum cost.

The storage of such crop or crops is provided for under the Federal warehouse act, or any approved State warehouse systems, and can be done with the least possible cost.

Proper and most efficient marketing should be obtained under the directions or suggestions of the cooperative marketing division of the United States Department of Agriculture.

It appears to me that the Government has already provided ample basic facilities for handling or financing the surplus of any and all nonperishable farm crops; the only thing remaining to be done is to coordinate the work of these agencies, clothe them with a responsibility, and use the proposed farm surplus board as a connecting link between them and the organized producers. This will eliminate hundreds, thousands, and millions of dollars in the way of administrative expenses, and will have the effect of economizing on the Coolidge policy of economy.

ECONOMIC MARKETING—WHERE, WHEN, AND HOW



In order to market crops to best advantage from every standpoint it is important to know where the demand is greatest and market facilities are best. It is important also to know the time as well as the place crops can be sold to the best advantage, and then no little attention should be given as to the manner in which crops are placed on the market, because it is often the appearance and stability of the pack that brings the maximum returns to the producers. The cost of getting the product to market is another factor deserving most careful consideration, for after all it is not always the price the farmer receives, nor the market at which the crops are sold, the time they are sold, or the manner in which they are placed on the market that determines his net returns, but quite often it is the cost of transporting his products to market that accounts for his increased and ever-growing losses. The illustration shows how the operations of this bill enable the producer to know where, when, and how to market his crops to the best advantage.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce was created a few years ago by an act of Congress and given authority to promote and develop foreign and domestic markets and promote American trade therein. If this governmental agency is properly functioning, it will stand as an economic barometer, registering at all times the demand and location of markets for American crops and products. In other words this bureau should be able to say at any time where, if any, a market may be found for any farm product.

The cooperative marketing division of the Department of Agriculture was created by an act of Congress two years ago and directed to—> render service to associations of producers of agricultural products, and federations and subsidiaries thereof, engaged in the cooperative marketing of agricultural products, including processing, warehousing, manufacturing, storage, the cooperative purchasing of farm supplies, credit, financing, insurance, and other cooperative activities.

This same act provides that this division shall study the operation, financial and merchandising problems of cooperative associations; make surveys of the accounts and business practices of representative cooperative associations; confer and advise with committees or groups of producers as to the best and most useful methods and practices in marketing farm crops or the products thereof. It appears to me that the only additional legislation needed along this line is that which will put this division to work in a practical and definite way and coordinate its activities with other governmental agencies and with the board provided for in this bill. In other words the Government has already provided an agency for working out a system of efficient and economic marketing, and to enact further legislation for this purpose would simply be a useless, extravagant, and unwarranted expenditure of the people's money. This branch of the Government is well equipped and should be in a position to render most efficient service as to the manner, time, and method of marketing farm crops. It already has the authority to do so and should now be charged or clothed with the responsibility. The idea is to promote voluntary cooperation of producers and not enforced subordination to the will of any board or set of men.

In addition to the services to be rendered by the cooperative marketing division as to when and how farm crops should be economically marketed, the board would be in a position to cooperate with the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining and arriving at fair, reasonable, and just freight rates on agricultural products, and there is no doubt but what this is one of the very vital factors entering into economic marketing. This phase of the farm-relief problem is not even contemplated in any of the other bills introduced looking to the relief of agriculture, and I am satisfied that every Member here who knows anything about agriculture realizes that the relief from excessive and unfair freight rates on farm crops is as vital and essential as any other phase of the problem before us, and no legislation for farm relief will be complete that does not take this phase of the problem into consideration.

The board will have the right, the authority, and will be charged with the duty to see whether freight rates are excessive or discriminatory. For instance, if the board should find that a freight charge of $160 on a carload of watermelons from Allendale, S. C., to New York is excessive and should not be more than $100, it would file a formal complaint and submit evidence with the Interstate Commerce Commission requesting that a fair, just, and reasonable rate be fixed. The same consideration would be shown to other crops and other sections.

STABILIZED PRODUCTION—ACREAGE DIVERSIFICATION

I have outlined in a general way the operations of the proposed bill as it relates to surplus control and economic marketing of farm crops. I have endeavored to show how these two factors in agricultural relief should be coordinated in their activities. But there is an additional factor to be considered in solving the agricultural problem, and I am not certain but what it is the most important factor yet suggested; that is the stabilization of production. It seems from the hearings before the Committe on Agriculture that a good many people have an idea that the farm-relief problem consists only in providing some arrangement whereby the surplus of any crop may be removed from the market on "fat" years and fed back into the market on "lean" years, or "dumped" on the world market for whatever price it may bring. On the contrary, I take the position this is only a part of the problem; the other, and possibly the major part, being to devise some plan, scheme, or policy for stabilizing or controlling production.

Surplus control alone will not, within itself, bring definite and permanent relief to agriculture; neither will economic and scientific marketing within itself bring the desired relief, but the two must be coordinated and supplemented by a program that will regulate or control the acreage of those crops wherein there is an occasional surplus. Of course, whenever a surplus occurs I am heartily in favor of taking care of that, just as I have already proposed; but one of the best ways to handle the surplus over a period of years is to stabilize production as near as possible. It is almost axiomatic to say that if you remove the surplus and stimulate prices, increased acreage and increased production will certainly follow, and any surplus-control legislation that does not provide in some way for the control or regulation of acreage will, in the end, prove to be of little or no value.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, some have argued here that production is not always determined by acreage. That is absolutely true; but I know, you know, God knows, and everybody else knows, especially if they know anything about farming, that while production in any one year is not determined solely by acreage, increased acreage over a period of years, other things being equal, will certainly mean an increased production and an increased surplus. In other words, in order to obtain permanently successful agriculture, and we are not looking for a mere temporary solution, there must be such a diversification of crops, or a regulation of acreage, that total production will in a measure coincide with actual and legitimate demand. And when we speak of agriculture in this connection we refer to the industry as a whole and not to any particular type of farming, for no type of agriculture can be permanently successful while other types suffer or fail. Sooner or later there will be a leveling. The real problem, therefore, is to arrange a policy or program that will enable the various types of agriculture to adjust production or supply to meet natural requirements. This bill attempts to regulate acreage by withholding the benefits provided for therein for any particular crop in case the acreage shows an increase in acreage of that crop over the average for the five years previous. Some have said this is unlawful, or it can not be done, and yet the only argument submitted by these same people to justify the legislation for agriculture is that Congress has enacted laws for the special benefit of the railroads or transportation; that it has enacted legislation for the special benefit of industry or the manufacturer; and it has enacted special legislation for the benefit of labor and others, and for this reason they say special legislation should be enacted for the benefit of agriculture.

I think their reasoning is quite logical, and the suggestion is both pertinent, reasonable, and highly germane. I think that legislation should be enacted for the relief of agriculture and gave my reasons at the outset. However, the proposed legislation is intended to have the same effect as the legislation referred to in connection with transportation, industry, and labor, especially that part of the legislation looking to the regulation of acreage and stabilization of production, for it is almost wholly upon this principle that the Government has aided transportation. It limits the facilities for transportation, which is nothing more nor less than limiting supply or regulating production. You would not think of building a railroad from here to Chicago or New Orleans without first securing permission from the Interstate Commerce Commission. Transportation facilities are therefore limited; the supply is determined and fixed by the Government. It has done the same thing for industry. It simply built what we sometimes call a tariff wall around the United States which, in effect, prohibits the importation of manufactured goods. It regulates and controls production by placing a limit on the supply. The Government does the same thing in very much the same way with reference to labor. It builds another wall around the United States and limits the supply and curtails production. It then limits production or further supply by fixing the hours which constitute a day's work. Nothing wrong in this, and I am not criticizing or finding fault, but I am only trying to show why the same principle should be followed in an effort to aid agriculture, for if Congress is going to enact a law for the benefit of agriculture I want to enact one that will do some good. Let us put into that law a provision that will have a tendency, at least, to regulate acreages and control production, and when we have done that successfully the problem is well on toward solution.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Would it divert the gentleman if he yielded at this point?

Mr. HARE. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman has made a very splendid statement and I am very much interested in it. I can see where the Congress can regulate immigration, the railroads, and those engaged in railroad service, but where do we have the constitutional right to reach down and take hold of agriculture, which is not interstate and which is not named in the Constitution, like immigration and import and export duties.

Mr. HARE. I probably did not make myself clear.

The Government does not attempt to fix acreage. The Government does not attempt to say to a man, "So far shalt thou go and no further." It does not attempt to say what he shall plant, how much or how little he shall plant. The only thing the Government does is that it sets up an agency and says to the farmer: "If you will comply with the conditions you will receive the benefits." The banker does not compel me to sign a note, but I have always found that the signing of the note is a condition precedent to getting the money.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am wondering whether the gentleman has the principle in mind that has been followed by Congress in the maternity act and other acts wherein the proposition is made to the States that if they will accept so-and-so the Government will do so-and-so?

Mr. HARE. Let me say to the gentleman that I did have that in mind, and we can go back to 1861——

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky (interposing). So it finally resolves itself into this proposition: Will the farmers agree with the Government on a certain policy and agree to carry out certain things, not based upon any compulsion of law—is that it?

Mr. HARE. The gentleman is correct. I wish to state further that this idea with reference to economic marketing is for the purpose of developing cooperative marketing, voluntary cooperative marketing and not enforced cooperative marketing in any way. I might say further, in replying to the gentleman's inquiry, that I think it was in 1862 or 1861, this Government passed what was known as the Morrill Act, providing for the establishment of agricultural colleges throughout the country and calling upon the States to meet them halfway on this proposition. A little later Congress passed what is known as the Hatch Act establishing the agricultural experiment stations, wherein the States would meet the Government halfway. Later on Congress established what is known as the extension service, to my mind one of the greatest services that has ever been rendered the agricultural interests of this country, and purely on the basis that the States would come in and meet the Government halfway and furnish dollar for dollar. There are a number of other precedents established by the Government for this principle or for this policy.

It should be remembered that a law simply entitled "farm relief" will not within itself stabilize agriculture or bring certain and permanent success. It will succeed just in proportion as it is able to harmonize and coordinate the major factors in production and marketing farm crops in the most economic way. Every successful farmer knows that he must consider the adaptability of the soil to the crop grown. He knows that the character and quantity of fertilizers used must be considered in his farm organization. He knows, further, that the extent to which any of the factors entering into his farm organization will contribute to the success or failure of his farm will be determined by the economic wisdom exercised in their use and application. The same principle is going to apply in the success or failure of farm-relief legislation. It should be remembered that every dollar of profit saved in putting this machinery into operation will find its way into the pocket of the producer, and every dollar of added expense necessary to put it into operation must be taken from the pocket of the producer, and unless we are very careful the machinery may be too expensive for the benefits to be derived. To illustrate: There is much improved farm machinery that could be used on many farms, but we all know that the cost of such machinery can not be justified by the operations on every farm. Now, a number of bills have been introduced for the relief of agriculture and most of them contain much merit, but the expense incident to installation and operation is too much to expect profit. Therefore in the enactment of any law we must be careful lest we install a machine that will be a burden and a liability to the farmer instead of being an asset and a relief. The coordination of the various agencies already referred to and provided for in this bill attempts to reduce the cost of operation to the minimum.

I think it proper to say in this connection that under existing arrangements for warehousing cotton, for example, a separate and distinct agreement or contract is necessary for every warehouse, there is a different insurance rate, and a different storage charge in practically every instance. Under the proposed plan there would be central warehouses with maximum capacities located where insurance and storage would be the minimum. None of the other bills looking to taking care of the surplus seems to take this or other questions of cost into consideration. I gather from information furnished by the warehouse division that the cost of storing cotton per bale last year ranged from about $3.25 to $7.25, or a difference of about $4 per bale, depending, of course, on the location of the warehouse and facilities for fighting or obviating fire. It appears that by centralizing the storage you could easily reduce the cost of insurance and storage to $2 or $3 per bale, and save as much as $4 per bale in these two items alone. I understand further that approximately 7,000,000 bales of cotton will be stored in Federal warehouses alone this year. This would mean $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 saved to the producers on these two items alone on this particular crop.

You may talk about taking the surplus off the market on "fat" years and placing it back on "lean" years and charging the cost of insurance, storage, grading, sampling, and so forth, to the farmer in the way of an equalization fee or tax, or whatever you may choose to call it, but if you do this without taking into special consideration these costs and charges the expenses will run away with you, and your plan or scheme is doomed to failure to begin with. Placing the cotton in central warehouse will save at least $2,000,000 annually in the item of sampling and grading alone, for under existing arrangements the cost incident to sampling, classing, and grading is an enormous expense which heretofore is borne by the producer.

I said at the outset that it was not my purpose to be particularly critical of any of the other bills, but I want to say just here that one of the bills provides for making loans to any cooperative association engaged in handling, purchasing, marketing, or controlling the surplus of any agricultural commodity in excess of requirements for orderly marketing, or it permits the board in its discretion to make loans to individuals, corporations, or agencies for the purposes named. The point I want to make is this: There are over 10,000 such associations in the United States, and would be entitled to loans under the provisions of that bill, and the board would have the right to make loans to 10,000 or more other agents or agencies and then charge the producer a fee, or levy a tax upon his product, sufficient to pay the additional costs and charges incident to making these loans. In other words, under that bill you may be compelling the farmers to foot the bill for employing 1,000, 5,000, or 10,000 unnecessary employees incident to making thousands of loans, whereas the bill I am submitting for your consideration, the number of loans should not exceed two dozen, for under my bill you would make a loan, for example, to only one cotton cooperative association for holding the surplus, or to one cooperative wheat association, because one association can take care of the surplus as easily as a hundred associations can, and you would be relieved of the cost and expenses incident to making loans to the other 99, or possibly 999, associations, and a penny saved is a penny made. One of the real purposes of legislation is to reduce the expenses or costs incident to agriculture. Furthermore, when you are making these hundreds or thousands of loans you are not only increasing the costs to farmers, but you increase the competition between cooperative associations and, in effect, discourage cooperation, just the opposite of what the bill says is its purpose, and just the opposite of what is contemplated in practically all of the proposed farm relief legislation.

As I have just stated, the board under the proposed law may elect to deal with only one association for each commodity, and the dealings will be only with an approved cooperative association, which means that the Government of the United States is placing its seal of approval upon the cooperative effort of producers. It is not only suggesting to them the economy involved in their joint and united effort but says that it is ready and willing to lend a helping hand to aid and assist in the effort, and this is what I call farm relief that is worth something. It means the control of the surplus crops at the least possible cost and not at the expense of hundreds and thousands of employees, to be paid from a tax or equalization fee to be collected from the producer or, if not paid, to become a lien on the crop produced by the sweat of his brow. The virtue of this provision is easily understood when I tell you that the entire surplus of the cotton crop can be handled through only one association instead of trying to handle it through a dozen or more, because the last report of the cooperative marketing division says that there are 121 cooperative cotton associations in the cotton-producing States.

Another feature of the bill already referred to in the cost or expense bearing heavily upon the income of the farmer is the unreasonable, unfair, and, in many cases, excessive freight rates.

The other feature of stabilized production should be discussed at greater length, but time will not permit.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman explain what he means by stabilized production?

Mr. HARE. Stabilized production comes as a natural result of the provision in the bill which says to agriculture that if the acreage is increased over and above the average for the five years prior thereto, then the benefits provided for in this bill will not be available.

This will mean, if I were planting 500 acres of cotton, which I do not do, I would say to myself, The Government has established an agency, the Government has established an institution that will assist me in taking care of my surplus at a price, I imagine, not below the cost of production, provided I maintain my usual acreage, but if I increase my acreage and plant more than 500 acres, I can not expect it. On the other hand, if I plant 500 acres or less, I can expect it.

What will be my reasoning? I will say to myself, I will plant only 500 acres or less, and I will proceed then to devise plans and means for increasing my yield per acre, diversifying my operations, and minimizing my costs.

When you have done this, friends, you have made a long step toward a solution of the agricultural problems, and until we do get to the point where we can maintain a certain production by decreasing the cost and by diversification I do not see much hope for agriculture.

When it is generally understood that the provisions of this bill, if it should become a law, can not be applied in taking care of the surplus of any crop when it is shown that the acreage planted exceeds the average acreage for the five years previous thereto, there will be no disposition on the part of farmers to increase acreage, but they will naturally and logically devote more attention to increasing yields per acre by more intensive methods, by improving their soils, and by greater diversification. The effect will be that in the course of years we will have a stabilized production of all crops and, therefore, a stabilized agriculture. You will see from the above classification that the easiest and most logical way for promoting stabilized production is by a more or less uniform acreage and diversification, not only of crops but of agriculture. That is, farmers will know not to put all their eggs in one basket when it is learned that the benefit of this governmental agency we are proposing will not be available if there is a persistent effort to increase acreage and thereby increase production and add to the surplus. The cooperative marketing division will emphasize this feature of the bill to those who are members of the commodity cooperative association of producers, the Extension Service, through its county agents, will carry the message into every nook and corner of this country, and then the farm surplus board and intermediate-credit banks will verify it when opportunity affords. In other words, we are proposing to utilize existing governmental agencies to assist and to aid in bringing about a permanently successful agriculture.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. How would the gentleman carry on diversified farming over what we might call a rotation of three or four years? In some localities in my State, for instance, we have clover this year, we follow that with corn and then with wheat and then clover. Then they have so much ground laid apart for pasture, but in this rotation they put out so many acres each year regardless of prices and they feed up the corn they raise on the one-third regardless of the price of livestock or hogs, and I should think it would be very difficult to carry on this rotation under that method.

Mr. HARE. That would be a farm-management problem and not contemplated in the operations of this bill further than that the extension service cooperating and coordinating its efforts with the board would enable your farmers to regulate their acreage and diversify their crops in such a way that your production would be more or less uniform, and then in case of a surplus of any one of these particular crops by an unusually good year by reason of abnormally good conditions, such surplus would be taken care of by the surplus control board.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. I am very much interested in this, because I have put it into practice. I farm by proxy, but nevertheless I am very much interested in it now. The difficulty comes with respect to our rotation of crops, which we are almost compelled to do because our ground is not the newest or the richest.

Mr. HARE. I might say to the gentleman it is not the purpose of this bill to enter into the field of agronomy, horticulture, or farm management, but to take charge of the surplus on the occasional years when there is a surplus, develop a system of economic marketing by encouraging and assisting cooperative marketing, and then stabilize production.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. MORGAN. It is claimed by the advocates of the McNary-Haugen bill that the prices will be automatically raised to the extent of the tariff rates on the product. Under your system, I assume from your statement that in the five-year period there will be no surplus, and in what manner will you maintain prices equivalent to the tariff?

Mr. HARE. I regret to say that I am not able to answer the gentleman in detail, because we know nothing about tariff benefits down in my country. [Laughter.]

However, if production is regulated so as to meet normal and natural demands, the system of marketing and surplus control I am advocating will take care of prices, and over a period of five years the surplus of one or more years should be consumed by the shortage of other years. If not, then any and every plan yet suggested for surplus control will be an absolute failure, including the one I am proposing.

Mr. MENGES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I will.

Mr. MENGES. The gentleman is talking about cooperatives. I would like to know how he is going to organize and maintain this enormous cooperative that he is talking about?

Mr. HARE. Just as easily as any other cooperative. I take the position that every crop ought to have its cooperative association for handling the surplus, and then you can have as many others as you may want for handling the remainder of the crop. For instance, there is no reason why we should have 121 cotton cooperative associations in the South to take care of the crop when it can be done by 1.

Mr. MENGES. That does not answer the question. I asked the gentleman how he is going to get 121 cooperatives together on cotton?

Mr. HARE. If we establish this plan it is not contemplated that an effort will be made to get these 121 associations together, but I know that there is enough ingenuity, enough ability, and enough skill among the cotton farmers of the country to organize a cooperative association to take care of the surplus if the Government will do its part, and I am one who believes that this cooperative effort should come from the producers themselves, and the effort should be free and voluntary and without any coercion or compulsion whatever, because I am opposed to creating any kind of an agency that will compel farmers to join a cooperative marketing association or make them pay their share of the operating expenses in case they do not join.

I have already stated that when it comes to handling the surplus of any crop it should be handled by one association, because if the Government is to aid or assist in advancing the money one can handle as easily as a hundred and do it at much less expense. Furthermore, suppose you would be trying to handle the surplus of the cotton crop with 50 or more cooperative associations, all under different management and control, neither would know when or where the others were planning to sell, and as a consequence you would probably find a half dozen or more trying to sell on the same market at the same time, and would therefore be competing with each other just as individual farmers are doing now, but if one organization is handling the entire surplus it can be done with less than half the cost, and then it can be placed on the market and sold to much better advantage.

The chart on page 2 illustrates the point I am trying to make. You will observe the number of black-headed pen lines running into the circle designated as the "board." These represent agricultural cooperative associations, and under some of the farm relief bills submitted for consideration practically every one will be entitled to loans through the board, and the cooperative marketing division of the Department of Agriculture says in its last report that there are 10,803 such associations. Think of the enormous number of employees it will take to make loans to 10,000 associations, or 5,000, or even 1,000, because a loan should not be made until a representative of the board could visit the section where the association is located and see if conditions and circumstances would justify the loan. The expenses would be charged either to the local association and collected as an equalization fee, or the Government would be called upon to employ this army of men and the people would be called upon to increase their taxes and pay these salaries. Under this bill you would have only one association to deal with for each crop when it came to handling the surplus, and probably only one insurance company to deal with in warehousing the crop. In this way I am sure you could decrease the cost or overhead charges a thousandfold or more.

The larger part of this chart illustrates how the work of the various existing governmental agencies would be coordinated and how the board deals with the commodity cooperative association of any one particular crop.

The small circles on the line connecting "cotton" with the "board" represent central warehouses, illustrating how a dozen or so of large central warehouses could be used in storing cotton instead of the hundreds and thousands used under existing arrangements, thereby effecting a saving of $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 a year on this one crop alone.

Now, in conclusion, gentlemen, let me say that a great deal has been said about the importance of this great industry in the political and economic life of our Government. I do not know that I can add anything to what has heretofore been said along this line, or pay a greater tribute to the life and character of the farmer as reflected in the history of our Government and in the life and existence of our commercial and industrial activities than as has been pictured here from time to time, but I want to say this great industry we call agriculture is no doubt the greatest and most honorable occupation on earth and has had placed upon it from the beginning of time the great seal of God's approval, which could be assigned as another reason why its demands should not be overlooked by Congress. For we find that our first parents, Adam and Eve, were no doubt horticulturists, because, by divine direction, they were placed in the Garden of Eden and commanded to dress and keep it. Abraham, who walked and talked with God, by divine selection was rich in cattle and probably the greatest ranger that ever lived. Then Jacob of old was well versed in the practical science of stock raising, and his efforts in animal husbandry not only met the approval but received the benedictions of an All-Wise Providence. Pharaoh, the wicked king of Egypt, dreamed of seven good ears of corn on one stalk. The government at the suggestion and under the direction of Joseph, through the guiding hand of his Creator, took care of the surplus of the farmer during the fat years and gave it back to the markets of the world in the lean years that followed. Moses, the meekest of the meek and saved from a watery grave, led God's chosen people from bondage and then sang of the increase of the field, the butter of kine, the fat of lambs, the kernels of wheat, and the pure blood of grapes. Joshua, under Omnipotent direction caused the sun in its fleeting course to halt and stand still long enough for the armies of Israel to avenge the enemies of Gideon; and with the same guiding hand he was permitted to cross over the river with his never-ending army, settle in the plains of Canaan, and enjoy the fruits of a land that flowed with milk and honey. Then there was Ruth, the most lovable character of sacred history, who dignified the labor of the man who eats bread by the sweat of his brow, with queenly beauty, dignity, and honor followed the reapers and gleaned in the fields of Boaz. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in January of this year I received a letter from the Boston University School of Education, in Boston, Mass., in which its writer states:

> We are making a survey to determine the 10 most pressing national problems in politics, economics, history, and civics.

I answered that letter, and in my letter took the position that the agricultural problem was the first and most pressing national problem among the 10 which were called for.

On April 7 of this year I received a letter, nonpolitical in its character, addressed to me from the Hon. E. H. Callaway, of the firm of Callaway & Howard, attorneys at law, of Augusta, Ga., which deals with the question of freight rates, since the passage of the Esch-Cummins law. Mr. Callaway is not only one of the outstanding men and one of the ablest lawyers in the State of Georgia, and an ex-judge of the superior courts of the Augusta circuit, but he is a dirt farmer, being one of the largest planters in the southeastern section of the State. I ask unanimous consent, because of the fact that we are soon to adjourn and others have time ahead of me, to insert this letter as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

CALLAWAY & HOWARD,
Augusta, Ga., April 9, 1928.

Hon. CHAS H. BRAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHARLIE: I noticed in one of the local papers a list of issues which you had given out confronting the country, and in one of them you suggested that the freight rates on the necessaries of life should be reduced.

I do not think this issue as you describe it meets the situation at all. As a matter of fact, from my observation the overwhelming increases in freight rates since the passage of the Esch-Cummins bill have had more to do with the destruction of values in the agricultural sections of the country than any other single fact, even more than the large increase in the tariff by the Republican Party. But it is the result of my observations that the masses of the people do not comprehend that fact, and will not comprehend it unless some accurate detailed statement of facts is furnished to them.

I have been told by parties who claim to know that the total decrease in farm values throughout the country will amount in the aggregate to some forty or fifty billion dollars, and that the actual increased railroad values since the passage of the Esch-Cummins law will amount to approximately the same huge amount.

I note from information furnished me by local manufacturers and merchants here and other interests that the increase of freight rates in this section will run from two to five times as much as they did prior to the passage of the Esch-Cummins bill. For instance, a large merchant here, retired from active mercantile business about six years ago, tells me that the freight rates on merchandise from New York to Augusta are from three to five times what they were back in 1920. I asked how this could be, when the increase in rates was only about 50 or 60 per cent. He explained by saying that this had been accomplished by changing commodity rates in classification. He says that the rates six or seven years ago, before the percentage increase, embraced a large number of articles, most of which ran from 59 cents per hundred to 75 or 80 cents, and that the highest commodity rate at that time was about $1.90, but that there were only two or three commodities that paid the high rate, and now nearly all the commodity rates had been raised to the higher classes and paid from $1.50 to $1.90 per hundred, whereas there were very few commodities that paid less than $1 per hundred.

The brick manufacturers in and around Augusta had a change in their rates that absolutely curtailed and stopped their shipping beyond a 150-mile radius of Augusta because of the tremendous increase in the rate beyond that distance. Of course, that shut out the brick shipments by curtailing the territory, and while the railroads have howled about losing that business, they have done nothing, nor has the Interstate Commerce Commission done anything to change it, and the brick manufacturers have had to hunt for other outlets for their products in a nearer and narrower territory.

Last week an Augusta farmer came to see me about selling his hay, and told me he could not sell his hay in competition with the timothy hay shipped here from Indiana, Ohio, and the Northwest; and I asked why, and he said because they were shipping hay here at a very low freight rate, whereas up to this year the freight rate on hay from Indiana and Ohio had been $18 a ton, and those people were then shipping their hay here in carload lots and selling at $25 a ton, and by reason of the recent great reduction in freight rates they were now able to ship here from the northwestern territory and sell it at $18 a ton and drove his hay out of the market. I then asked him why he could not ship his hay from here up to the Northwest, and he stated that while they had reduced freight rates in a tremendous way from the Northwest here, that the rate from Augusta up into that territory would amount to the same old $18 per ton in carload lots.

The rate experts we have here confirm all of these things, and there are so many thousands of instances that there seems to be neither rhyme, reason, nor rule in freight rates.

In fact, my son-in-law, who is in the mercantile business here, tells me that freight can be shipped by boat from Portland, Oreg., or Seattle, Wash., through the canal to Charleston, and from Charleston to Savannah by rail, and from Savannah by rail to Swainsboro, 30 miles below Augusta, at considerably less, on canned goods, than the freight rate from Augusta to Swainsboro.

Last summer while my son-in-law was operating the boat on the Savannah River the American Sugar Refining Co. made an arrangement with the Merchants & Miners Transportation Co. to ship their sugar from Baltimore to Savannah by boat and from Savannah to Augusta by boat at 39 cents per hundred, in order to enable the American Sugar Refining Co. to compete with the Savannah Sugar Refinery. This arrangement had not been in operation more than 30 days before overnight, and without notice, the Atlantic Coast Line reduced its rate from 79 cents per hundred from Baltimore to Augusta to 38 cents, 1 cent less than the combined water rate. As stated above, you can get thousands of instances of this.

As you probably know, the through carload freight rate, including refrigeration on a carload of fruit, grapes, peaches, or any other commodity, from California to Augusta or New York, a distance of 3,000 miles, is less than on a carload of peaches with refrigeration from Augusta to New York, a distance of 800 miles. I was also told several days ago that there is some commodity shipped from the North to Athens and from Athens over the Central Railroad to Macon and from Macon to Millen and then to Augusta, and that the Central Railroad shipped it this way in order to get one-half of the entire freight charge on the shipment.

The Central Railroad president, Mr. Pelley, publishes about once a month in the Augusta Chronicle, and also in the Augusta Herald, about half a page advertisement, bragging on the flourishing conditions of the country and how the railroads are improving their service all the time, and how they are reducing freight rates all the time, none of which has a single atom or iota of truth in it, and yet, from my knowledge of the charges for publishing such letters in the local papers here, they must pay $400 or $500 for each insertion.

Senator HARRIS told me while in Washington the other day that all of those publications by the railroads were charged up to expense account, and they are adding onto the freight rates wherever they please to pay for it. And, of course, this shuts the mouths of the newspapers; they will not criticize or publish any information about the railroads or what they are doing to the people. I noticed the Chronicle this morning criticized your suggestion that freight rates ought to be reduced. Of course, the Chronicle does not propose to offend the railroads or do anything that will stop that $400 or $500 a month in big advertisements, and yet the people have to pay for these advertisements. I have not seen where any politicians, or leaders of any kind, who are supposed to keep the public informed, have discussed these matters at all.

Some five or six months ago Mr. W. J. Craig, the general freight and passenger agent of the Atlantic Coast Line, of Wilmington, N. C., was in my office several times, and I had a considerable discussion with him with reference to freight rates on fruits and vegetables from Georgia to the North. I asked him the question if the railroads were going to absolutely destroy the peach crop in Georgia, and his reply was that it would be destroyed unless the Georgia peach growers would cut down at least 12,000,000 of their trees. I then told him that I had recently been in Boston and also in New York during the peach season, and I saw very few peaches on the fruit stands, and in every instance they were asking 50 cents a dozen for the peaches—and they were very moderate-sized peaches—and I told him that unless the freight rates and refrigeration rates were reduced so the peach growers could make a living out of it, it would result in the destruction of the peach crop in Georgia, and the railroads would lose the freight business on the Georgia peach crops. It is true that the Georgia peach growers have never organized sufficiently to distribute their peaches, but they tell me that the railroad charges for shipping are so high that they can not extensively distribute them as the banana growers have succeeded in distributing theirs.

Mr. Craig explained to me how much the railroads had invested in refrigeration for loaded peach and vegetable cars in New York, but that means nothing to killing the Georgia peach crop. The same thing applies to the shipment of watermelons or cantaloupes, and though our people are doing their best to diversify and raise fruits and vegetables and supply them to the East, the railroads crush them out; and the only hope that I can see to save the South is for them to organize and build a large refrigeration plant at Savannah, ship their peaches there, and then put refrigeration in two or three ships and haul their peaches to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore and distribute them from those points. I imagine that the railroads will then fall over themselves giving the Georgia peach growers and truck growers a reasonable rate.

I am also informed that fruits and vegetables can be shipped by rail—and are shipped by rail—from Florida to New York and the East at considerably less than they can be shipped from Florida to Georgia. Of course, that is the result of water competition. So that I repeat again, distance in freight rates in carload lots has nothing to do with it; bulk as to freight rates has nothing to do with it; weight in freight rates has nothing to do with it. The long-and-short-haul proposition is a farce. The railroads are permitted to charge all they want to charge on any kind of shipment, for any distance, and my information from local people is to the effect that complaints to the Interstate Commerce Commission have no effect, and even where they are investigated it takes three or four years to get a ruling, and then the ruling is made in such a way as to put heavier burdens on the people. The result of all this is that they are not merely destroying the business but are starving to death every conceivable kind of enterprise here, whether of manufacture or agriculture, and are asking for change of rates and higher commodity rates, and, judging by the experiences of the past, the Interstate Commerce Commission will give it to them.

Of course, you are familiar with the surcharge on Pullman fares. Every time I pay a Pullman charge for Pullman service, I feel like I am tipping the railroad, because I pay my railroad fare at .036 a mile. I then pay my full Pullman charge for its service and have to tip the railroad company, or the millionaire owners of the railroad companies, half the amount of the Pullman fare for no service. But I suppose the big millionaires who own the railroads need this tipping just as the porters or the waiters on the dining cars need it, but I sometimes can not see how they can take the money.

The next point is the enormous increase in the value of the railroad stocks. Prior to the passage of the Esch-Cummins bill the Southern Railroad common stock stayed around $20 and $23 a share for years and years. In fact it had never represented anything much. Shortly after the passage of the Esch-Cummins bill the rich gamblers of New York bought up a majority of the Southern Railroad stock, beginning at around $20 a share. Since then they have raised the value until it is now $147, and it is now paying 7 per cent dividends.

During the same period the Atlantic Coast Line stock went from $90 a share up to practically $200 a share. The Seaboard Air Line ran from less than $1 a share up to at one time between $50 and $60 a share, and I think is now selling around $25 or $30 a share. The Louisville & Nashville, that had declared a large stock dividend, reducing its stock below $90, has gone up to approximately $150 a share. This is what has happened to all of the railroads in the country, and from thirty to forty or fifty billion dollars have been taken off the agricultural and associate interests of the country and given to the gamblers of Wall Street and to the rich millionaires of the East largely through the railroads.

Of course, these matters can not be presented, except through accurate figures. I have not the access to those figures. I should imagine the Interstate Commerce Commission could furnish the figures as to how much increased values have been added to the owners of railroad stocks, and I suppose the Agriculture Department could furnish information as to how much values have been taken off of the agricultural interests in the country, and I suppose if you take the large protected industrial plants, that have been made richer by the tariffs, they would indicate also where they had accumulated their immense fortunes. The same thing is, in a measure, true with reference to what the power trusts are doing in the country and are now doing in the South, and particularly in Georgia. I also have information that the communists and socialists of the East, North, and Northwest are growing in numbers and sympathizers, and that if something is not done to check this destruction of enterprises and property values of the great masses of the people other than the rich protected capitalist that that sentiment will spread and we will have an upheaval in this country that may largely wipe it out.

I think that the Democrats ought to have some kind of an investigation made by accurate statisticians about all these matters, so that it can be presented in concrete form to the country, and I think one of the leading planks in that platform ought to be on this railroad question and presented in a way that the people can understand it.

I think the West is sympathetic with the same view that I am taking, but whether they know literally what is going on I do not know.

It seems to me that the present Interstate Commerce Commission ought to be wiped out, and probably the Esch-Cummins law ought to be wiped out, and that the commission should be divided in power, and that there should be a branch of the commission located in the Southeast, another branch in the Northeast, another branch in the central part of the country, and other branches in the various divisions of the West beyond the Mississippi River; and that these commissions ought to be put in close touch with the people, and handle railroad and freight questions promptly, fully, and intelligently, and that the ruling spirit ought to be to relieve the people from the oppression of those gambling, speculating millionaires or malefactors of great wealth who are using the Government and the Government agencies to plunder the country and gradually destroy it. You can see from this letter that I feel very strongly on this subject. I am sending a copy of this letter to Senator HARRIS. I don't know whether the Democrats in Congress really appreciate all this, or whether they really have the definite information about this mixed-up matter of freight rates, or whether there is something that they are afraid of in touching the railroad question. Everybody down here, even the railroad employees, know about it; but when you mention it they say, "Well, what are you going to do about it?" Of course, Mr. Coolidge names the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and of course the Interstate Commerce Commission is serving its masters; but if the Democrats hope to do anything to correct this they must get up the statistics and facts and the numerous inconsistent rates, and they must put it accurately before the public in a manner in which the public can understand it. The propaganda that the railroads are putting out is nothing but bribery to quiet the newspapers.

It may be that you can get in touch with somebody up there who can get up this information and get it before the public in a manner in which they can understand it. If so, your constituents in Georgia will bless you.

Very truly yours,

E. H. CALLAWAY.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have prepared a speech upon the spoils system, but before taking up that subject I wish to compliment the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE] upon the splendid discourse that he has just delivered upon the subject of farm relief. My good friend from South Carolina has introduced and has now pending in this House one of the best farm relief bills that has been introduced at this session. To my mind, however, that bill fails to cover one point, and I turn aside from the speech which I have prepared on another subject to take a few minutes of the time allotted to me, not for the purpose of criticizing the gentleman's bill but for the purpose of suggesting that if he will just modify the bill a little and make it stronger along the line of controlling production he will have a most splendid bill. I have introduced a bill which does that. To my mind the bill which I introduced sets up the best plan for the control of production of any bill that has been presented to this Congress. I hope I am not egotistic in that respect. To my mind no farm relief bill can work effectively 100 per cent unless it has within it a proper control of production.

Just as surely as we elevate prices without some sort of control of production, just so surely will the farmers themselves plant more corn and more cotton and more wheat and produce more and bring about the greater production. In other words, any bill which fails to have within it a proper control of production has failure written on its pages.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Suppose we control our home production, and we will say that we have it within the limit that it should be, what are you going to do to keep Australia and South America and Argentina and these other countries from flooding this country with their export wheat and meat produced with cheap labor?

Mr. LANKFORD. I do not wish to get into a tariff speech at this time, and I agree with what the gentleman has in mind. I would be in favor of putting a tariff on those products and keeping them out in favor of the farmer, and I say to the gentleman that my position on the tariff is simply this, and I have stated it before. I object to the tariff because ordinarily you can not put enough tariff on farm products to help the farmer as much as you hurt them when you put the tariff on the manufactured article that he has to buy, but I shall vote for a tariff on any farm product [applause] which is about to be shipped into this country to interfere with the prices of farm products produced in this country. But let me get to the other proposition. I said just a few moments ago that I thought that the gentleman's bill did not go quite far enough in its effort to control production. Some one asked the gentleman this question, whether or not the production could be controlled under the Constitution. In other words, could we pass a bill and say to the farmer, "Thou shalt not plant so much corn or so much cotton."

Would it be constitutional? It probably would not be. Someone suggested that we might control the proposition by getting the States to pass a law to control production, provided the Government rendered to the farmers in those States the necessary assistance.

To my mind the proposition of control of production of farm products can best be accomplished as a matter of contract by simply saying to the American farmer through a statute passed by Congress, "Here we will render you people certain assistance; we will help you solve your problem in so far as we can; but there is one part of it that we can not solve, and that is the question of overproduction. We will do our part, provided you sign contracts with each other and with the governmental agency set up by Congress, to the end that you will in a certain manner and by a certain method control your own production."

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. How will you enforce that?

Mr. LANKFORD. I will enforce that by providing, in a bill creating a farmers' finance corporation, that this finance corporation shall make certain advances to the producers of the country on certain basic agricultural commodities and grant certain loan privileges, provided the producers planting 75 per cent of the acreage of wheat, for example, sign a contract with each other and with the governmental agency and with the bank with which they are to do business that they will allow their production to be controlled by an advisory council selected by them.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is it constitutional to limit production?

Mr. LANKFORD. Oh, I provide that they shall enter into a contract to control production before they get assistance.

Mr. SIROVICH. But how does the farmer know when he plants his crop whether he will get 5 bushels or 50 bushels an acre?

Mr. LANKFORD. If you cut down the acreage each year and have a plan to limit overproduction, you will come very near, next year, to controlling that production.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Certainly.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The gentleman may be interested to know that the late H. C. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, who had perhaps more to do with the formation of the McNary-Haugen bill than any other one man, always made the stipulation as one of the conditions that all these arrangements and devices for increased prices would be absolutely worthless unless there was coupled with them some control of production. He always made that condition or provision.

Mr. LANKFORD. The only efficient way of controlling production is to have the farmers themselves enter into a contract to limit production.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Suppose you would have overproduction and then limited your acreage, and the next year you had a crop failure. The people of this country would not have enough to eat.

Mr. LANKFORD. Then they would pay the farmer better for what he did raise.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Would it not be better to enable the farmer to have a fair price?

Mr. LANKFORD. By my method the farmer could fix his own price. He could say to the world, "We have produced too much this year, but all of it is not for sale. We will sell cotton at 25 cents a pound. How much do you want at that price? We will not sell at less."

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Unless he raises a fair crop he can not say that.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. As I understand the gentleman, he accepts all the policies proposed by Mr. McNARY as to the regulation of farm products and marketing, except that you would go to the extent of contract relations limiting production?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes; by the farmers themselves.

Mr. MORGAN. Suppose a crop was raised and during the five-year period the domestic price rose above the import price. What would happen?

Mr. LANKFORD. That would lead me into a discussion of the tariff, and I do not have time for that discussion now.

Now, I want to say a few words in connection with the spoils proposition. The appointments to postmasterships in Georgia, as you know, are not controlled by Democratic Congressmen, but by the Republican State executive committee.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Do you propose to limit production? [Laughter.]

Mr. LANKFORD. I would be very glad to limit the production of recommendations and other activities of Republicans who do not deal fairly with my section of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the very life of our Nation is imperiled by the vicious spoils system now in operation, rampant throughout our country. Its poisonous fangs are penetrating every branch of our Government and endangering the liberties of the whole people. Two good men—a registry clerk and an excellent postmaster—in my home city of Douglas, Ga., a few days ago went to their death as a result of the spoils system. On every hand every day one has but to stop, look, and listen to see the awful effects of centralized government run mad with spoils hydrophobia.

The usurpation of State rights by the Federal Congress and the abject abdication of those rights by Congress to bureaus, operated under a spoils system smelling "to high heaven," constitute the greatest crime of the age.

On last Friday I reintroduced a bill introduced by me over two years ago to stop the solicitation of so-called campaign funds from postmasters, rural carriers, postal employees, or other appointive officials. This bill provides as follows:

That no person shall solicit or receive in any manner any contribution of money or other thing of value from any postmaster, rural carrier, or postal employee, or any other Federal employee, for any political purpose whatsoever; neither shall any person solicit or receive in any manner any contribution of money or other thing of value from any candidate or applicant for postmastership, rural carrier, or postal employee, or other Federal employee for any political purpose whatsoever, or for or in connection in any way with any recommendation or help that may be rendered or promised such applicant or candidate.

SEC. 2. Any person who has made such contribution of money or other thing of value for political purpose to any person, organization, or political party shall not accept the position of postmaster, rural carrier, or postal employee, or other Federal employee whatsoever within six months after such donation or contribution.

SEC. 3. No person shall receive, directly or indirectly, for himself or for any other person, group of persons, or organization any money or other thing of value, for any recommendation of appointment of or help to any applicant or candidate for any postmastership, position of rural carrier, postal employee, or other Federal employee. Neither shall any person, having made such donation of money or other thing of value, accept and hold any postmastership, position of rural carrier, postal employee, or other Federal employee.

SEC. 4. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine not in excess of $500, or imprisonment not exceeding three years, or both.

Mr. Chairman, the House Committee on the Judiciary two years ago refused to favorably report an identical bill of mine and reported favorably and helped to pass the Wurzbach bill, requiring postmasters and certain other appointive Federal officers to file an affidavit that they had not purchased their offices as a prerequisite to receiving their salaries. This law is easily circumvented by some friend of the applicant without the knowledge of the applicant being required to put up money as "campaign funds." The applicant is appointed, makes the required affidavit within the law, and is then beseiged from time to time for campaign funds. The postmaster or other official is informed that in order to be in good standing with the appointive powers he must make the required contributions. He knows he must put up or later lose out. If he does not put up "campaign funds," some one else does. He loses out; the other fellow goes in.

Along with the Wurzbach bill was passed the Stevenson bill, making unlawful the sale of postmastership appointments, and so forth, but, as just pointed out, this law is very little, if any, more effective than the Wurzbach measure. I was sorely disappointed when these bills were passed in lieu of my bill, and then urged that these bills would prove futile. My predictions were absolutely correct, as is now established.

Prior to the passage of the Stevenson and Wurzbach bills, there were of force two statutes touching remotely the spoils system as applied to postmasters, rural carriers, and other postal employees. Neither interfered to any considerable extent with the present baneful situation. One statute prevented the sale by a public official of an appointment of a postmaster, rural carrier, or other Federal position. Of course, some one other than an official handled the matter. Another statute prevented the solicitation of campaign funds within a post office or other Federal building, but did not protect the Government official after he left the building.

Thus it will be seen, no law has been enacted to stop the fleecing of postmasters and other postal employees. My bill, if enacted, will go very much further than has ever been gone before, but I very much fear that nothing will permanently stop the evil effects of the spoils system other than the destruction of the system itself.

Congress and the executive branch of the Government here in Washington is to blame for the whole system. What interest does a man living in north Georgia have in the appointment of a postmaster in my district in south Georgia other than dollars and cents when that man was never in the town where the postmaster is to be appointed, will never be in that town, knows none of the people there, never expects to know them, never expects them to vote for him, knows that his party can never carry that town, or county, or State in any election, and expects nothing of value, either directly or indirectly, from the people of that community other than "campaign contributions"? The spoils system is wrong and invites corruption.

I understand that the Postmaster General now threatens to fire any postmaster or rural carrier that happened not to be shrewd enough to stay within the law and, perchance, technically violated the law while putting up "campaign contributions." He proposes, though, to keep the system steeped in spoils in full force and allow the vacancies created by his firing process, again bartered and sold.

Mr. Postmaster General, your abominable system is rotten to the core. The real blame is here. It can not be dodged. Why purposely keep a system in force and blame any one who is forced to contribute "campaign funds" under that system? You know what your system invites. Why purposely help ensnare good people, help fleece them, then bring ridicule and contempt upon them by depriving them of the position which your system made them pay for, and then reset the same trap to catch and ensnare others?

Mr. Chairman, even before I came to Congress I was alarmed over the spoliation of State rights and the eventual utter destruction of the liberties and rights of the individual. On May 21, 1919, the third day after I took oath of office as a new Member of Congress, in my first speech here in behalf of my people, I said:

The time will come, if the Federal Government continues to encroach on the rights of the States to settle their own affairs, when our States will need no legislatures, for all of our laws will be made here and administered in the Federal courts. Our State and county lines are being blotted out. The people of each county are slowly but surely losing their rights. The States are gradually becoming States in name only.

Mr. Chairman, after more than nine years of service I am more and more convinced that the counties of the States are losing their rights and the States are losing their rights, but, worse than all, Congress is passing all its rights and powers, both present and past, as well as prospective, on to individuals who are not the choice of the people and who ofttimes are not really responsible to any one.

We have only to "stop, look, and listen" in Congress and out among the people to see and hear the awful effects of the menace about which I am speaking.

There are so many invasions of the rights of the States and so many surrenders of the rights of the people to the bureaus that I will not attempt to list them at present. I do want to direct my attack, however, at lump-sum appropriations. I hope to speak of some of the other surrenders later.

More and more Congress is making lump-sum appropriations and leaving the distribution of the funds to the bureau or to underlings of the bureaus. Why? Is it because Congress can not determine how the appropriation should be dished out? Is it because Congress, or the Members of Congress, wish to shirk their duty? Is it because the appointees of the bureau chief are more efficient or more conscientious than Members of Congress? What is the real cause of this desire to pass the power to legislate in this respect to bureaus?

Are these privileges and rights passed on to the bureaus in order that they may become spoils? I shudder to ask the question. I do wish that I could think that this does not enter into the proposition.

It is a dangerous thing to put too much power in the hands of too few men. It is impossible for our President, or any or all of the cabinet members, to keep up with these details. It sounds like a joke to be delegating powers to the President to handle the details of dishing out money or patronage, or the details of making rules and regulations for the carrying into effect of any law passed by Congress when Congress admits that nearly 500 Members of the Congress can not do it properly. Why shove the responsibility on any one man of doing what 500 shirk and admit their inability to do properly?

It matters not whether Congress passes its powers on to the bureaus for the purpose of these powers being used as a part and parcel of a spoils system; the fact remains that Congress is inviting corruption. Not only is Congress inviting corruption, but the corruption is evident. We see only a small part of it. Occasionally the curtain is lifted, and we get only a glimpse of the rottenness of paying political debts with patronage or with other people's rights or money. We should get as far away from the spoils system as possible. Our President condemned the spoils system in his message, and I would not fear the spoils system very much if all these matters could be handled by the President, by the average Cabinet member, or by Congressmen, but this is impossible.

It is bad enough to steal the other man's property, but it is much worse when it is stolen not because it is needed but for the purpose of destruction. It is bad enough when we take from the States that which belongs to the States and the people of the several States. But the crime becomes much more abominable when we take for the purpose of destroying what we take or turn the loot so recently taken over to those whom we know will use the property taken for the destruction of the very people from whom it was taken.

If the Congress has reached the place in its existence where it is too timorous to exercise the rights given Congress by the Constitution, then Congress should not be seeking to deprive the States of any additional rights, but should be passing back to the States whatever rights Congress feels unable to exercise. In no event should Congress be taking from the States rights which it does not expect to exercise and which it expects to immediately pass on to bureaus and bureau chiefs. The flow of rights and privileges and powers should be from Congress back to the States and to the people of the several States rather than from the people and the States through Congress to bureaucrats.

This is the people's Government and not the Government's people. Let the people run the Government and this Government will endure—let the Government run the people and our Nation will perish.

The Government should never govern the people. It should only be the means by which and through which the people govern themselves.

Congress obtained its powers from the people, and if there be any powers which Congress feels too anemic to exercise, then those powers should be returned to the people from whom they were derived. If any Congressman gets tired of his commission, let him return it to the people who gave it to him, and not deliver it to some bureau chief who was not elected by anybody. If any Member here does not know what his district wants, then how does he expect some bureau chief or some underling under that chief who never saw his district to know what his people desire. I am willing to assume the responsibility of representing my people, and when I so far forget my duty as to want to pass that blessed privilege on to some stranger who happens to be a bureau chief, or an appointee of a chief or some political henchman of the party under whom the bureau chief was appointed, then I will resign my commission and hand it back to the people who so kindly gave it to me.

I am speaking very plainly about this matter, not for the purpose of hurting anyone's feeling but for the purpose, if possible, of preventing Congress from hurting the people of our Nation.

Mr. Chairman, on January 20, 1926, there was pending a bill authorizing the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury to determine in the future where and when post offices and other Federal buildings should be constructed. During the course of that debate (p. 2467 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 20, 1926) I said:

Now, what about the proposed bill to appropriate a large sum of money to be delivered to the Treasury and Post Office Departments to be used by these departments in erecting buildings whenever and wherever these departments may determine? There was never a more vicious bill. What is the necessity for this kind of a bill? Is Congress incompetent to determine where buildings should be built? Is the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds incapacitated to report out a bill specifying where buildings should be built and the amount to be expended for each building? Are the various Members of Congress unable to determine what should be done in each respective district? By what legerdemain can some mysterious person, reported to be acting for the Post Office Department or the Treasury Department, go to any Member's district and determine these questions? The Secretary of the Treasury will not do it. The Postmaster General will not do it. Neither of these gentlemen could do this if they did nothing else and tried to do all these things.

If Congress can not do this, who is there that can? Are these Federal buildings and grounds to be dished out to the faithful, as the post offices are dished out? Is there to be made a charge for the recommendation for a Federal building, the same as charges are now made in many places and practically all over the South for recommendations for rural carriers and for appointment as postmaster? If not, why not? Oh, what a fine chance this unelected individual will have to get fees for recommendations. If the system of making postmaster appointments is followed in selecting locations for these Federal buildings, then the Republican referees will make the recommendations for public buildings, and the referees, of course, will not have time to go to the different counties, and some one not even appointed by the department will make the collections and report which places should be recommended. Some may say I am overdrawing the things which will happen. This is what is happening with the appointments of the men to occupy buildings. Then why not the same rule apply as to the building? Then just think what 10 per cent of the amount to be spent on a building would run to.

During the course of my remarks the following colloquy occurred between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] and myself:

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LANKFORD. I will.

Mr. BEGG. I think the gentleman is making a serious charge.

Mr. LANKFORD. I am.

Mr. BEGG. And I want to ask the gentleman, Does the gentleman know that to be the fact?

Mr. LANKFORD. I do, or I certainly would not make the statement.

Mr. BEGG. Has the gentleman turned over the information he had to the Department of Justice, the prosecuting department of the Government? That is a Federal offense, and the gentleman has his recourse, if he knows that to be the fact.

Mr. LANKFORD. I understand it is not a Federal offense.

Mr. BEGG. Oh, yes; it is. If the gentleman has looked up the statutes passed by this Congress the gentleman knows it is a Federal offense, and I think the gentleman is making a very serious charge.

Mr. LANKFORD. I am making a serious charge.

Mr. BEGG. And if the gentleman would make that charge any place other than on the floor, the gentleman could be held to an accounting.

Mr. LANKFORD. No; I could not, for I am stating the truth.

Mr. Chairman, after the colloquy I continued as follows:

I have called the attention of the Post Office Department to this thing, and it has been called to the attention of the Department of Justice, but upon investigation it is found that there is no law to cover this kind of thing when it is done outside of a Federal building by some one who is not an official. They are careful to stay within the law.

Oh, gentlemen, why do we invite this sort of a spoils situation? Why can not we decide for our people just what we want them to have?

It may be insisted by some that the day of the pork-barrel system no longer exists. Well, if I am to choose between pork and spoils, I will say, "Give me a little more pork." I much prefer a barrel of decent pork rather than a train load of flyblown beef.

I much prefer a few Federal buildings to be located by Congress in each district rather than millions of the people's money to be used in a spoils system as pleaseth a few sent to rule over the people without the people's permission or vote.

The time is at hand when men who never saw my State, men whom my pepole did not vote for and had no chance to vote for, men not in sympathy with the traditions and American impulses of my people, yea, men who do not like my people, hold in the hollow of their hands the power to control almost every activity of my people. They can and are destroying the rights, liberties, and lives of my people. Talk about free, representative government! Every centralization of power is a blow at liberty and is the undermining of our form of government. Every enlargement of the power of men who hold office by appointment is a weakening of representative government. The spoils system inevitably leads to corruption and anarchy.

Centralize enough power here, carry the spoils system to its fullest extent, and give the Executive sufficient power to enforce his decrees and you have the worst Government since the beginning of the human race. If we are to save this wonderful Government which our forefathers gave us let us return to the old teachings of the fathers before we shall have lost all.

Is Congress to eventually take from the States and the people in the States every vestige of authority to control local affairs? Is Congress then to abdicate its right to legislate and give to department heads, bureau chiefs, and other appointive officials all the right to legislate, and then let these officials appointed under a spoils system dish out rules, regulations, and laws under a spoils system, thus controlling all rights of all the people under a system of spoils, rottenness, and corruption?

Mr. Chairman, discussing the same bill just referred to on February 15, 1926 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 15, 1926, pp. 4030–4031) I said:

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I had hoped that a bill would be passed at this session giving each congressional district some very muchly needed post-office buildings. I have not altogether lost that hope.

We may yet get a good bill.

"While the lamp holds out to burn the vilest sinner may return."

The supporters of this nefarious bill to pass the power to select sites and build buildings onto already overworked Cabinet officers and their immediate subordinates, to be in turn by them, as they of sheer necessity must do, passed on to some mysterious, unknown individual, say those of us who oppose this sort of thing favor pork-barrel legislation.

Well, if we have "pork," let it be decent pork on the table in the daytime, with all invited to participate and to be shared by the common folks and the smaller cities as well as by the larger cities. Appropriations for the big cities is termed "in behalf of efficiency and economy," while appropriations for the smaller cities is derisively termed "pork."

This is worse than the most vicious form of a "pork barrel" bill.

Its advocates expect to secure enough help to pass it under suspension of the rules without giving its devotees even a smell of decent pork. They expect you to line up and do their bidding for only a passing sickening whiff of the "flesh pots" of corruption.

They are not willing for you to "stop, look, and listen" in order that you may determine how great is the sacrifice you are making and how great is the penalty you are inflicting on others in order for you to get less, much less, than a "mess of pottage."

Without giving you a chance to protect those you represent and yourselves, the champions of this bill expect you to help them drive the legislative car in front of the mighty onrushing juggernaut of centralized, all-powerful bureaucratic government.

Oh, if Lincoln was alive he would pray more earnestly than ever "that this Government of the people, for the people, and by the people might not perish from the earth."

Oh, they expect to stampede the Members of Congress like so many "dumb driven cattle" into selling for a stench of corruption the birthright of a great and glorious people.

Pass the bill without the chance for reasonable debate and with no chance for amendment, is the battle cry.

They are not willing for us to have a chance to examine their proposed "mammon of unrighteousness." They do not want it known just how tainted and flyblown is the concoction which their witches stir.

Fillet of a fenny snake,
In the cauldron boil and bake;
Eye of newt and toe of frog,
Wool of bat and tongue of dog,
Adder's fork and blindworm's sting,
Lizard's leg and howlet's wing.

Cool it with a baboon's blood,
Then the charm is firm and good.

Mr. Chairman, on March 14, 1924, in speaking of the Teapot Dome scandal, I said:

An awful experience is ofttimes turned to a blessing in disguise when a lesson is learned which starts an improvement of the awful conditions which brought about the experience.

Again, on the same date, I said:

The multimillionaire Secretary of the Treasury, Mellon, said that he would like to be chairman of the select small committee to manipulate and shuffle the enormous foreign debt of billions of dollars so as to take care of the big banker, big rich, and men who have profiteered so as to be in the millionaire class. The Secretary gets what he wants, for now it is that "to the victor belongs the spoils." Of all funds ever raised the great common people are more interested in the money raised during the Great War than in any other. It came from people of every station of life. The widow, the orphan, and the poorest of the poor, all did their very best. A large part of the fund thus raised is now due us by foreign powers. That money is the common property of every American citizen. Yet it is being shuffled and manipulated as pleaseth a favored few who believe that "to the victor belongs the spoils."

In the same address I also remarked:

Mr. Chairman, this country is in a deplorable condition, with a party in power using the spoils system to the limit when the whole Nation is suffering the agonies of hell because of the lack of proper legislation and because those in power play politics while the Nation burns. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the party in power is worried more about the "good of the service" of the Republican Party than they are about "the good of the service" of the American people. They are worried infinitely more about efficiency of a man as a campaign or boodle contributor, or political manipulator, than they are worried about the efficiency of a man as a public servant. The Bureau of Printing and Engraving was turned upside down in violation of law and contrary to established rights of honorable men and women "for the good of the service" of the Republican Party. The civil-service system established by wise men of the past has been strangled and mangled and its very death threatened "for the good of the service" to the Republican Party. It has been proposed to make spoils of hundreds, yea, thousands, even millions, of positions in this Nation in order to dish out those rights to Republicans "for the good of the service" of the party.

To the victor belongs the spoils. My God, to what extent is the spoils system going? The Veterans' Bureau is a hotbed of the spoils system for the good of the service, not of ex-service men, but of the Republican Party. Is our entire Postal Service a seething cauldron of spoils to be stirred with the paddle of political hatred "for the good of the service" of the Republican Party and not for the people? It is understood generally that Attorney General Daugherty is the chief of spoilsmen. He wants no civil-service system. He wants no merit system; he wants everything controlled by the spoils system. He wants the Department of Justice to become the department of spoils and wants to become the chief keeper, preserver, and protector of the spoils of the victors for the good of the service of the Republican Party. It is easily understood why Daugherty does not want the merit system used in the selection of public officials.

He prefers the spoils system. He likes a system under which he and others like him can qualify. He has made the Department of Justice the department of spoils. It is no longer the Department of Justice; it is now the department of "just is." It is now operated for the glory of Daugherty, the ignominy of the Republican Party, and to the shame of the Nation. A statement was carried in the newspapers the other day that Daugherty wanted the prohibition-enforcement service put under the Daugherty spoils "just is" department. He would like to dish out the large amount of money allowed for prohibition enforcement. The enforcement service would soon be a pretty kettle of fish with Daugherty trying to play politics with the service. The whole enforcement service is about to break down now, because many men are being put in the service for political reasons only.

It is now said that President Harding was misled into dismissing the employees of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. I do not doubt this suggestion. That good man was misled every time he followed men like Daugherty. The Attorney General ought to be satisfied with spoils, but yet he wants more. He has spoiled and flyblown his position as a Cabinet member; he has spoiled and flyblown the Republican administration; and, if permitted, would make spoils of every right of the American people.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, why say so much about the Teapot Dome scandal; know ye not that "to the victors belong the spoils?" The Teapot Dome transaction is larger, but no more corrupt than the sale of public offices for cash or to pay political debts. It is no worse than a profiteers' tariff for the big Republican rich, to the undoing, destruction, and even death of millions of the great consuming public. I repeat, it is no more corrupt to be influenced by money to sacrifice the interests of the American people in these oil properties than it is either under the guise of law or without lawful authority to take the hard-earned money of the consuming public by a profiteers' tariff and give it to the big corporations either for cash or to pay political debts. There is no longer in this country a protective tariff. It is now the profiteers' tariff. The Republican Party is still the G. O. P.; it is now the Grand Old Profiteer.

If the Republican Party follows much longer the leadership of such spoilsmen as Daugherty and continues to sell her party virtue for money and for political purpose, she will soon be without a single virtue. The Teapot Dome controversy can not be any more corrupt than the dishing out of offices solely and only for political reasons.

Mr. Chairman, during my address of March 14, 1924, just referred to, in speaking of the so-called flexible provisions of the tariff law, I remarked:

A general tax bill was so drawn and passed by the last Republican Congress as to relieve the big rich of much of the burdens of taxation. The big rich either have contributed much campaign funds to the Republican Party or can do so when it will be much needed in future campaigns. The big rich are protected on the theory that "to the victors belong the spoils." A tariff bill was enacted by the last Republican Congress to protect the profiteers and the concerns with big sacks of money who either did contribute heavily to past campaign funds of the Republican Party or are in position to contribute in the future when funds will be sorely needed to be used in convincing the consuming public that it was taxed for its own good. So it goes that "to the victors belong the spoils." It is even provided in this tariff bill that the President have the power to increase or diminish duties as he sees proper. If men and women are deprived of offices because they do not subscribe to the Republican faith and do not contribute to Republican campaign funds, then why should not people who are not Republicans and do not help put up a slush fund be deprived of the protection of a desired duty on goods in competition with goods they sell? If the President by Executive order and otherwise dishes out offices to Republicans because they are Republicans and leaves off others simply because they are not Republicans, then why not dish the protective-tariff soup to the Republicans who show their efficiency by a nice campaign contribution? "To the victors belong the spoils" is being worked overtime.

Oh, it is said that men are being put out of office and Republicans are being put in "for the good of the service," it being known to all that he who serves the Republican Party is one who is "for the good of the service," and efficiency from a Republican standpoint is fully attained by the profiteer who puts up money for campaign purposes. The good of the service of the Republican Party must be maintained, regardless of the cost to the public. "To the victors belong the spoils."

Mr. Chairman, when I criticized Attorney General Daugherty four years ago and said the Veterans' Bureau was a hotbed of the spoils system, I was criticized as being too harsh and unjustly condemning public officials. My remarks now read like a prophecy, for Director Forbes has since been sent to the penitentiary and Daugherty was finally forced out of the President's Cabinet.

Mr. Chairman, I have always hated the vicious spoils system. I regard it as the most dangerous influence in our national life to-day. It is so insidious, so deceptive, and yet it poisons everything it touches.

Congress is taking from the States and from the people in the respective States all the rights and liberties of those people, and then, oh! awful truth, Congress is abjectly passing all the rights of the people on to bureaus and Federal appointees, to be by them in turn checked out to a favored few under a system of corruption and spoils.

Mr. Chairman, now I want to quote from the RECORD, of April 19, 1924, pages 6733 and 6734, as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, it was stated by a leading Republican in a speech a few days ago that investigations in Washington were being conducted by "insolent groups." The gentleman should have said the investigations were being made by "indignant groups." In fact, the entire country is filled with righteous indignation, not at the investigations but at the disclosures.

Those being investigated and upon whom most shocking disclosures are being made are most anxious to stop all investigations and to discredit those being had. Some evidence goes in which is not true. This will not injure the innocent. Much evidence is being adduced which points definitely at the guilty. This does hurt the guilty and is helping to some extent to clear the official atmosphere. There is much propaganda in favor of stopping all investigations and turning all attention to legislation. I realize that there is much legislation which is very necessary. There are vital appropriations which should be made. There are many good measures which this Congress will ignore, regardless of what else is done.

Just here let me say that the country is not very favorable to legislation which only gives more money and more power to spoilsmen, many of whom are still in harness. We need legislation, but we also surely need purification of government. It is infinitely better for us to not pass a single additional bill and not make a single new appropriation and clean out by investigation, exposure, and removal all corruption rather than feed that corruption by more power and more of the people's money. Corruption is gradually getting a death hold on the very vitals of our form of government. We must free ourselves while we have power left or the time will come when our vitality will be too low and the corrupt influences will be too powerful and will have too strong a hold on our throat. Even in matters of legislation here the people's money is offered for the purpose of getting votes for individuals or for parties.

The so-called German relief bill is simply a bid for pro-German votes. Why vote cash for German women and children and tax to the limit the clothing, the pins, the buttons, and everything which the poor women and children of America must buy in order to live, to raise the money we are giving away.

Mr. Chairman, why rob our poor widows and orphans of men who died fighting Germany in order to give to the very people who killed our boys and who would have destroyed us except for the bravery of the men now so soon forgotten?

Why vote our boys insurance and German people cash? Why vote German people cash on which to live and vote our brave boys and their people a form of funeral expense? Oh! the shame of it. In the few additional minutes allowed me at this time I wish to read to the House a most excellent editorial which appeared in the Valdosta Times of my district in the issue of the 15th of April of the present year:

CONGRESSMEN DEFICIENT

There is need of carrying the congressional investigations much further, even to the examination of the mental caliber of men who will vote against a bonus for the veterans of the World War and for a bonus for German children, and especially at a time when Germans are sending their own money out of the country and the rich are squandering their wealth in Italy and southern Europe, and also when the German Government is planning to refuse the admission of American flour to Germany because of the abundance of flour and other foodstuffs in Germany.

There is something lacking in Congressmen who will thus neglect their own and force their philanthropy upon others, especially when such acts cost them nothing, and which may, on the other hand, set them right with the agriculturists, who expect to sell their products to the Government at fancy prices. The Congressmen expect by this stroke of statesmanship (?) to get in right with their constituencies and insure for themselves a return to Washington. Enough is enough, and the people generally know when they have had enough of such business as is at the present time directing the eyes of the world to Washington in wonderment at what the next American governmental development will be.

We have been pointing across the water to the European governments and pointing out their shortcomings, with pride in the belief that the officials of the Government of the United States were less corrupt. In the light of the present-day political activities we have been laboring under an hallucination that humbles that pride and fills the soul with shame, for we can see in the dim distance the finger of scorn pointed toward America and the great institution we have prided ourselves in believing was the model of excellence in government; not perfect, to be sure, but much nearer perfection than any other government in the world.

The fact is that the American people have been too busy with their personal affairs to pay much attention to what kind of a government we really had. The principles we know to be sound, the laws are models of excellence, and yet the very lawmakers themselves are the worst violators.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LANKFORD. Can the gentleman yield me two more minutes?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield the gentleman two more minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, on at least two former occasions during the present Congress I have made remarks on this floor along the line of this most excellent editorial and along the line of my present observations. I hope the investigations now taking place may be the beginning of a "house cleaning" which will make our Government clean in every respect.

We must stop the spoilsman and eradicate all corruption, or we will lose all. Mr. Chairman, I firmly believe that the combined armies and navies of the rest of the world can not defeat us from the outside if our Nation is pure, perfect, and strong on the inside. If our Government and our Nation, though, rots at the center, it will collapse of its own weakness at the slightest pressure.

Let us investigate our weakness as a nation, and let us trim out every cancerous growth. Let us not have a government of the people by the spoilsmen and corruptionists for the favored and unpatriotic few who put money and political preferment ahead of country and people. Let us have a government "of the people, for the people, and by the people," not only in name but in truth for with such government unspotted and unblemished we will never know defeat, and the Government which our fathers gave us will not perish from the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the spoilsmen of the past killed men, women, and children in order to rob, plunder, and carry away the spoils. If they were caught, they were shot or hanged. To-day the spoilsmen without any excuse rob men, women, and children of their reputation, which they built up during a lifetime and which is their all. They kill innocent men, women, and children and drive them to suicide by depriving them of their rights and giving the spoils to the so-called victors, and yet the spoilsmen of to-day sit in high places and boast of their authority in this grand and glorious Government of ours. Many of the common people of our Nation are filling premature graves because of legislation which makes the rich richer and the poor poorer and gives to bureaus and individuals the right to dish out favors and patronage.

It seems that many people are so wedded to the spoils system as to not even be willing to learn in the school of experience. The Teapot Dome scandal ought to cause an awakening of the public and a condemnation of everything that smells like "spoils."

Is every official of the public soon to be appointed under the spoils system, and are those spoilsmen to control every activity of this once free people? Are freemen to be cast down and spoilsmen to be enthroned? Is liberty a thing of the past, and political corruption the present dominating force?

Is this Nation, which can never know defeat by the armies and navies of the world from the outside, to rot unto death of political corruption and of the awful poison of the spoilsmen on the inside? This Nation can not long endure unless it purges itself of every vestige of the corrupt spoils system. The American people to-day enjoy probably not over one-tenth of the liberty for which our forefathers fought. To what extent will Congress go? Will we turn back before it is too late?

We are working the destruction of our Nation when we concentrate too much power here to be exercised by people not elected by the people, but by people holding office, the very commission to which is tainted with the odor of spoils. We ought to mind our own business and let the people manage their affairs. We should fight for more freedom and greater human rights, not for less. We should legislate for people to control their own legitimate activities and not for spoilsmen to dominate their every move. There is no one thing that Congress or the President can do which will so vitally serve the people and so fully guarantee the future safety of this Nation as to end for all time the present deplorable and baneful spoils system. Will we act for the right? Will we save our Nation by reestablishing not only in name but in fact every principle for which our forefathers fought, and which are embodied in our Declaration of Independence and in our Constitution, and which are placed by the Almighty in the heart of every free man?

May an all-wise God grant unto us here in Congress the foresight to see the certain destruction toward which we are drifting and the power to turn aside and save all before the final hour of doom shall have come. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 24 minutes to the gentleman from Porto Rico.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico is recognized for 24 minutes.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, it is not my wont to make frequent use of the privilege of the floor of the House. I do so only when my position as representative of the people of Porto Rico imposes upon me the duty of availing myself of this forum as a means of addressing the Congress and the people of the United States. Speeches for home consumption are very far from my mind. My main interest consists in being heard rather by the American people than by the people of Porto Rico.

On this particular occasion I rise to discharge an obligation which is certainly far from agreeable. I do not invite troubles, but when they are placed in my path I face them unhesitatingly in the performance of my duties.

The President of the United States has addressed a letter to Governor Towner which has produced a very unfavorable reaction on the people of Porto Rico. It is in order to expose my views anent this letter that I have requested the privilege of addressing the House to-day.

The Legislature of Porto Rico, through the president of the senate, Hon. Antonio R. Barceló, and the speaker of the house, Hon. José Tous Soto, have already replied to the President in a letter addressed to me. It is a very important document, which contains an elaborate review of our conditions and aspirations and will no doubt be very valuable to the members of the committees of both Houses in charge of our problems. I believe I am not asking much in suggesting to you a careful perusal of their reply. It is unnecessary for me to say that I indorse every word of it.

I wish to make clear, first of all, that since President Coolidge's advent to power I have endeavored to work in harmony with his administration, placing no obstacles in his way. I have followed this policy in spite of the fact that my recommendations have not been accepted by the administration. I remember that shortly after Mr. Coolidge entered the White House I recommended to the Bureau of Insular Affairs and to the Secretary of War a Porto Rican candidate for the post of commissioner of immigration.

The President appointed a continental American. In spite of this rebuff I accepted the appointment and advised its approval by the Senate. When the office of attorney general became vacant I submitted to the President the names of two distinguished Porto Ricans to fill the post. The President appointed a continental American from the State of Texas, and I accepted his appointment without opposition. When the term of the commissioner of education expired I recommended to the administration the names of two Porto Rican educators, trained in universities of the United States. The President reappointed the present commissioner of education, who is also a Porto Rican. Very recently I recommended a candidate to fill a vacant post in the supreme court. The President chose another candidate, and I not only accepted his appointment but gave it my decided approval when consulted on the matter by the Senate committee. In all my dealings as the representative from Porto Rico I have tried to give to the President of the United States my whole-hearted support. I hold the Chief Magistrate in the highest esteem. Personally he has always been very kind and courteous toward me. I am making these observations so that nothing which I should say in my remarks might be construed as springing from a feeling of hostility toward the national administration.

Porto Rico and the United States must necessarily live a life of harmony and friendship. It profits us Porto Ricans nothing to express our views in forms offensive to the American people. It profits the American people nothing to offend gratuitously the feelings of the people of Porto Rico. For this reason it is regrettable that controversies should arise which might bring forth as their consequence the use of words more or less vexing to both peoples.

President Coolidge's letter is, to my mind, humiliating to the people of Porto Rico. According to this letter we have done nothing but receive favors from the American people, and are highly ungrateful when we express our complaints and come to Washington in quest of greater liberties for the island. The United States owes Porto Rico nothing. It is we who are poor, we who are humble, we who are harborless, we who receive the benefits and the blessings of the American administration in Porto Rico. There is not so much as a word in the President's letter to suggest the proposition that, in holding Porto Rico, the United States derives benefits of a political and economic character. Any impartial observer, after having read the President's letter, might well ask himself why the United States insists in holding onto Porto Rico, in spite of the onerous obligations which such a policy is contended to impose on this Nation. We might say, in view of this official pronouncement, that we of Porto Rico are being the victims of the excessive love professed us by the national administration in trying to maintain all the power it has there and in denying the inhabitants of the island that participation in the government of their own affairs, which is their due. We would prefer less love for Porto Rico and more love for the liberty and happiness of its inhabitants. It is folly to attempt to make the inhabitants of our island happy in the American way. We want to be happy treading the path of our destiny in our own way. I know of no country in the world which has secured the happiness of another by handling its internal affairs.

We are not pretending to deny the benefits which Porto Rico has received during the American administration. But an attempt has been made to deal with our conditions from a point of view of American charity and not of Porto Rican rights. It is our duty to express our views and to declare emphatically that we are not asking for charity, but for rights.

The President begins by examining the conditions and tendencies of the people of Porto Rico at the time of the American occupation. An article written in 1892 by Doctor Coll y Toste has been unburied from the files of the War Department. This article describes the progress of Porto Rico for the previous 100 years. A relation of the conditions of our peasants at that time is contained in one of the paragraphs of this article. Nothing is quoted by President Coolidge from those portions of the article which praise the progress of Porto Rico. That this paragraph is the only one which criticizes existing conditions in 1892, is shown by the following words of Doctor Coll y Toste taken from the same paragraph but which were not quoted by the President:

> But, ah, if it be true that we have progressed much, comparing the final pictures of these two last centuries, and if it be true that our population has increased so much that from a census of 138,758 people it has mounted, according to the last enumeration, to 802,439 inhabitants, yet, unfortunately, at the heart of such a state of enlightenment a black stain is projected like a blot of ink on a picturesque drawing.

In this article Doctor Coll y Toste paints in vivid colors the condition of our peasants, making their weaknesses stand out and exaggerating throughout with the purpose of emphasizing the necessity of applying a remedy to the existing conditions. It was also his purpose to criticize the Spanish Government for inexcusable negligence in the performance of its duties. But what purpose is accomplished by the publication of his article in 1928? The unnecessary exhibition of these unfortunate conditions of the past, even if not intended to humiliate the people of Porto Rico, it really has that effect. Let me say in passing that the prize given to Doctor Coll y Toste by the Economic Society of Friends of the country was not particularly for his description of the peasant, as pointed out in the President's letter, but for the whole article, describing the progress of Porto Rico in the previous century. The author possibly was rewarded not for his description of the peasants but in spite of it. Although Doctor Coll y Toste analyzes in his study the conditions of our peasants only, the President states in his letter that this describes the great body of the population of Porto Rico.

The conditions obtaining in Porto Rico at the time of the American occupation were not very favorable. We acknowledge and admit that there was ignorance and poverty then, just as there is ignorance and poverty to-day in some sections of the country; but it can not be denied that there existed a powerful nucleus of our population which lived a comfortable life and developed its activities with relative ease and relative well being. There existed the basis of a civilization just as wise and just as vigorous as the Anglo-Saxon civilization. There was a nucleus of men trained in European universities, versed in different fields of endeavor, whose learning rivaled in depth and breadth that of educated men in Europe and the United States. Our representatives at the Spanish Cortes offer an irrefutable example of Porto Rican culture. Our men were the first to plead for the abolition of slavery. The great orator Emilio Castelar, in a speech to the Spanish Congress, praised the work of our men in the most glowing terms. At the Spanish Cortes the Porto Rican representatives enjoyed the same privileges as the Spanish representatives, and exercised the right to vote in national affairs. The same society of "Friends of the Country" which rewarded Doctor Coll y Toste's work was made up of Porto Ricans.

The culture of Porto Rico when the American forces reached our shores was exactly the same as the culture of Cuba: the conditions of the peasants were identical in the two islands and the sanitary and economic conditions were very similar. Cubans had no more experience than the Porto Ricans in the exercise of free government. They were practically governed by the same laws and the same autonomous government was granted by Spain in 1897 to both countries. In this connection it is very interesting to compare President Coolidge's statements when speaking of the two countries.

The President says in his letter that the "pitiable economic condition" which existed in the island "was one of long standing" and that "the tendency was to get worse rather than to improve." "One would look in vain," avers Mr. Coolidge, "for a single ray of hope if Porto Rico were to continue its normal course as we found it." Again he points out that "only 30 years ago one was, indeed, an optimist to see anything promising in Porto Rico," while "to-day one is, indeed, a pessimist who can see any reasonable human ambition beyond the horizon of its people."

When speaking of Cuba at his address before the Pan American Conference at Habana, Cuba, January 16, 1928, the President states:

> The very place where we are meeting is a complete demonstration of the progress we are making. Thirty years ago Cuba ranked as a foreign possession, torn by revolution and devastated by hostile forces. Such government as existed rested on military force. To-day Cuba is her sovereign. Her people are independent, free, prosperous, peaceable, and enjoying the advantage of self-government. The last important area has taken her place among the Republics of the New World. Our fair hostess has raised herself to a high and honorable position among the nations of the earth. The intellectual qualities of the Cuban people have won for them a permanent place in science, art, and literature; and their production of staple commodities has made them an important factor in the economic structure of the world. They have reached a position in the stability of their Government in the genuine expression of their public opinion at the ballot box, and in the recognized soundness of their public credit that has commanded universal respect and admiration. What Cuba has done others have done and are doing.

While the President of the United States is most enthusiastic in praising the intellectual qualities and the prosperity of the Cuban people in dealing with Porto Rico he says that we were poor, ignorant, distressed, and diseased, and that 30 years ago one was, indeed, an optimist to see anything promising in Porto Rico.

Cuba, however, since obtaining its liberty has been able to develop itself and organize a government worthy of Mr. Coolidge's highest praise. For us there were no promises of redemption. Porto Rico, it is made to appear to the people of the United States, would certainly have disappeared from the map had it not been for the timely aid of the United States. All that the President can say of us is that the United States has given "Porto Rico greater liberty than it has ever enjoyed and powers of government for the exercise of which its people are barely prepared," and that the Americans "have attempted, with some success, to inculcate in the inhabitants the basic ideas of a free, democratic government." It is somewhat difficult to reconcile Mr. Coolidge's views on Cuba, which is a foreign government, and on Porto Rico, which has remained under the American flag. The comparison does not seem favorable to the American administration of Porto Rico. Cuba, under her own sovereignty, has been able to establish a free government, and her citizens, according to the President, are capable of ruling their own destiny. Porto Rico, after 30 years of American rule, has not been able to develop these qualities or to demonstrate aptitude in the control of its own affairs. If the statements of the President are true, if his words in regard to Cuba are inspired by sincerity and not by diplomatic expediency, we could not offer a more convincing example of the advantages of self-government in developing the faculties of a people. If the words of the President with respect to our inexperience and unpreparedness for greater liberties are true, we could not offer a clearer example of the failure of the American people in developing the faculties of a people beneath its flag.

Returning to Mr. Coolidge's conclusions, based on Doctor Coll y Toste's article, it is proper to state that this ill-treated, pale, distressed, and ignorant peasant was strong enough in spirit and in heart to come down from the mountains of Porto Rico during the World War, covering long distances on foot, in order to offer his services to the American people. Many were rejected, being physically unfit, but many were admitted and trained under the leadership of General Townshend, the commander of our troops in Porto Rico.

Commander Townshend, now Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, is the best authority on the matter of the conduct of these peasants in the training camp. Approximately 17,000 men were trained under his able leadership, and the bulk of them belonged to the group described by Doctor Coll y Toste, which has served as the basis for the conclusions of the President. In an article published in the January, 1922, issue of the periodical Current History, H. P. Krippene says of these men:

> Most of the recruits came in from the country, and the majority of them were extremely illiterate, undernourished, and poorly clothed. Eighty per cent of them, perhaps, had never worn shoes, and had eaten only rice and plantains since childhood. Three weeks after these men had been organized into companies they were taken on a short march, carrying no equipment, and they came back a straggling, disordered, exhausted mass. Three months later, under a hot tropical sun, they were taken on a 20-mile hike with full packs, and not one of them dropped by the wayside. Expert medical and dental care, the daily Army ration, and scientific physical exercise daily had changed weak men to workers, failures to fighters. The work did not stop here. The healthful camp life, constant medical inspections, good food, the daily bath, athletics, and amusements, all contributed not only to a vigorous physical reaction, but to a quickening of the mental processes which also became noticeable. Peons who had entered camp with dazed, uncomprehending eyes, ignorant even of their own language, began to appear on the field with polished boots and well-pressed uniforms, carrying their heads erect, saluting with alacrity, and snapping to orders in a foreign tongue. They seemed to awaken to the fact that they, too, were men, and the American uniform gave them the courage of their convictions. Eventually they began to express a desire to learn to read and write, and classes were formed and taught by noncommissioned officers.

Later on the same article points that—

The enlisted man, however, was representative of the lower class living out in the hills; people who, up to the time of war, had scarcely felt the influence of American schools and their ideals. It may appear singular that the bulk of the Army was made up of this type, but it can be explained, perhaps, by the fact that Porto Rico was passing through a period of exceptional business activity and the educated and skilled workers were able to avoid the draft to a great extent because they were extremely necessary in their various occupations, whereas the peon had little or no responsibility.

These peasants of which we are speaking must have felt very deep in their hearts the humiliating remarks in Mr. Coolidge's letter.

We can not say that the conditions of these peasants has been improved during the American occupation. The man living in the mountains is to-day in as deplorable a state as he was 30 years ago. Porto Rico has undergone extraordinary progress, but it has not extended to the Porto Rican peasant to any noticeable degree. Doctor Coll y Toste's article describing the condition of our peasants, written in 1892, is no more severe than the report made by the Rev. Dr. George Luther Cady in 1928. Doctor Cady, corresponding secretary of the American Congressional Missionary Association, visited Porto Rico accompanied by nine leaders in the home missionary work of the organization. On his return to New York he made a report describing conditions which are more distressing than those described by Doctor Coll y Toste.

It would be unjust to judge the people of Porto Rico as a whole as ignorant, sickly, poor, and vicious merely from the fact that there exist conditions of poverty, which we all regret, in a part of our population. These conditions are not peculiar to Porto Rico. There are sections in lower New York, such as the Bowery, and in Hoboken, Newark, Albany, and Chicago where living conditions are as bad among the laborers, if not worse, than in Porto Rico. Certainly we are not going to judge the great city of New York, or the great State of New York, or the entire United States by conditions that obtain only in portions of the population of these communities.

I believe that both Doctor Coll y Toste and Doctor Cady exaggerate in their descriptions, but we can not deny that our peasant, undermined by the hookworm and enjoying very limited wages, is lacking in vitality and in the foods necessary for good nutrition. It is true that under the rule of Spain the wage of the peasant was very low, but it is also true that the cost of living was likewise very low. To-day cost of living has increased to an extraordinary degree, and higher wages are needed to face even the primary needs of existence. Doctor Cady tells us in his report that the average laborer earns from 55 cents to a dollar a day. This is the salary under the American flag in spite of the high cost of living. It is not very difficult to conclude from this that, no matter how serious the condition of the peasant may have been 30 years ago, present-day conditions can hardly be any better.

One of the most important problems that we have to face in connection with labor conditions is the excess of population. It is estimated that the population to-day is 1,450,000, or 422 persons per square mile. Due to the lack of industries unemployment is a particularly grave problem. The great excess of labor available over that required is the primary cause for the existing low wages.

To close our apology for the Porto Rican peasant we must say that this man, who is painted in such dramatic and tragic colors, possesses natural intelligence, harbors fine feelings, and has a frank and affable temperament. A hint of the possibilities of these men as first-class citizens of the future is afforded by a study of their progress as American soldiers during the World War. To quote again from the article by H. P. Krippene, referred to above:

The country people, as a rule, constitute the lower class. They are simple, trusting, naturally courteous, charming to strangers, and usually honest, though not industrious. The upper class is composed of refined, cultured, and progressive men and women. Many of them have been educated in American colleges and universities, have traveled extensively, and are cosmopolitan in ideas and customs.

Reviewing the finances of Porto Rico, the President says:

The treasury of Porto Rico receives the customs duties collected in Porto Rico, less the cost of collection. It receives the internal-revenue taxes which are laid by its own legislature and collected in Porto Rico, it receives the income taxes which are laid by its own legislature. It receives the internal-revenue taxes collected in the United States on Porto Rican products consumed in the United States.

The above statement is entirely correct, but the conclusions drawn from it are not entirely accurate. The President says that out of a budget of $11,191,893.11 the amount of $9,514,466.93 would not accrue to the local treasury were Porto Rico an incorporated territory. Mr. Chairman, this conclusion of the President is in my opinion most amazing. It does not speak very favorably of the system of government of the United States. According to the President's conclusions, it is possible under the Federal system of government to absorb almost 90 per cent of the revenues of a State or Territory, leaving only a 10 per cent to meet the expenses of the local government. I do not believe that any State or Territory would tolerate such an oppressive system of government. It is almost confiscatory. That is not the case in Alaska, that is not the situation in Hawaii or in any State of the Union. It seems to me that it is not difficult to prove the inaccuracy of the conclusions of the President.

Let us quote the paragraph of the President's letter dealing with the figures laid down by him:

In the fiscal year 1927 the total operating revenue of Porto Rico was $11,191,893.11. Of this total the following, in our States and Territories, would not accrue to the local treasury:

Customs	$1,806,567.91
Income taxes	1,565,745.98
United States internal revenue	440,650.71
	3,812,964.60
Excise taxes (which would in great part not accrue to local treasury)	5,701,502.33
Total	9,514,466.93

Were Mr. Coolidge's conclusions correct, we should have less than $2,000,000 on hand to defray the expenses of our Government under the territorial system. I admit that the customs duties and the internal revenue collected in the United States on Porto Rican products would accrue to the National Treasury were Porto Rico incorporated into the Union, but I take exception to the conclusions of the President regarding the other items.

The Federal income tax law extends to the Territories of the United States and would extend to Porto Rico if we were a part of the Union. But in this case we should have the right to enact our own income tax, as is done in the States and Territories. The State and Territorial income tax has nothing to do with the Federal income tax. We have in Porto Rico our insular income tax, which will not accrue to the Federal Government even if the Federal income tax is extended to Porto Rico. Under the Federal income tax now in force the Federal Government will not derive from Porto Rico the $1,565,745.98, which is the income received at the insular treasury under the Porto Rican law. Therefore we have to deduct this amount from the figures quoted by the President.

The President claims that the excise taxes would in great part not accrue to the local treasury. I would like to know what part of these taxes would not accrue to the local treasury. These are insular excise taxes which will always accrue to our Treasury, even if we were incorporated into the Union. What the President means, in my opinion, is that we will have to pay Federal taxes, but not that insular excise taxes would accrue to the Federal Government. So we have to deduct from the figures quoted by the President, the excise taxes, which amount to $5,701,502.33. If my conclusions are correct, only $2,247,218.62, out of our present revenues would accrue to the National Treasury. Of course, the Federal Government would have the right to collect the income tax under the Federal law, and any other source of revenue allowed by the Federal law as well, but that does not mean that the National Treasury would absorb the local revenues raised under the laws of Porto Rico.

It is true that the National Government, taking into consideration the economic conditions in Porto Rico, has not imposed on the taxpayer the burden of taxation under the Federal laws, as it has done in the Territories. But this does not justify the conclusion that the local revenues of Porto Rico would accrue to the Federal Government were we treated as an incorporated territory. It only means that the taxpayer under the Territorial system would have to pay more taxes than he is paying now, and that the Government of the United States has not deemed it wise to impose an additional burden on a country where economic conditions do not justify such a course.

In this connection, it is proper to state that while Hawaii and Alaska pay taxes to the Federal Government, they receive in compensation the benefit of the laws extended by Congress to those Territories. Regarding Porto Rico, every time that we ask for the extension to Porto Rico of a Federal law which carries with it the expenditure of a certain amount of money, the answer is that we do not pay a cent to the Federal Government.

I remember that in 1924 we asked for the extension of several laws to Porto Rico. Secretary of War Weeks appeared before the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions and made these remarks:

> I think the committee should keep distinct the legislation for Hawaii and for Porto Rico; they are under altogether different conditions. The Hawaiians pay nearly $6,000,000 into the National Treasury; the Porto Ricans pay nothing.

Senator Willis stated:

> In that respect it is quite different from any appropriation that may be made for Hawaii, because Hawaii is paying taxes.

Secretary Weeks replied:

> Quite different. The Hawaiians are presumably getting back their own money or some part of it, just as the States are.

On account of the remarks of the Secretary of War, no report was made by the committee in favor of the extension to Porto Rico of laws which have been extended to Hawaii and Alaska. Thus, if it is true that we do not pay taxes to the Federal Government, it is also a fact that many laws in force in the incorporated Territories are not extended to Porto Rico for the sole reason that we do not pay Federal taxes. Hawaii and Alaska receive the benefits of these laws as a compensation for the taxes they pay. The advantages, therefore, that Porto Rico derives over Hawaii and Alaska by not paying Federal taxes are not so great as we are deprived on this account of the benefit of many important Federal laws.

The President mentions in his letter the services which directly and financially benefit the people of Porto Rico, such as the Lighthouse Service, the Agricultural Experiment Station, the maintenance of the Porto Rico Regiment of the Army, the activities of the Veterans' Bureau and Federal participation in harbor improvements. It is of interest to note the care taken in the President's letter to emphasize trivialities and to waste no detail in his earnest determination to make known the benefits derived by Porto Rico from the United States. He mentions the Lighthouse Service.

Is it not natural to expect that since the Federal Government controls this service it would also pay the expenses of the same? He also mentions the activities of the Veterans' Bureau. If our boys were good enough to serve the Nation during the World War, is it anything but fair for the Federal Government to extend to the Porto Rican soldiers the same protection and care extended to the continental Americans? He also mentions the Federal participation in harbor improvement. Is it charity for the Federal Government to pay its share in this work when the people of the United States are almost exclusively receiving the benefit of our commerce? We admit that the maintenance of the Porto Rico Regiment is a great help to Porto Rico, but let us be reasonable and likewise admit that our boys are rendering a loyal and faithful service to the people of the United States.

The President says that "the United States tariff extends to Porto Rico," and adds that "no part, certainly no agricultural part, of our territory is so favored by its tariff." Our four principal industries are sugar, tobacco, coffee, and fruits. Of these four, the only one in a truly flourishing state is the sugar industry. It is true that this industry has developed extensively largely as a result of tariff protection and of the high prices during and immediately following the World War. But not all the benefits of this development are reaped in Porto Rico. The tariff has fostered the growth of large corporations in our island which control enormous quantites of land and are gradually concentrating ownership in a few hands. The small farmer is disappearing in Porto Rico, and this is largely due to the control of our land by powerful interests. Many of the stockholders of these corporations live in the United States, and obviously the benefits derived in their case are not enjoyed by Porto Rico but by the United States. It has been said that two-thirds of the benefits accruing from the sugar industry are received by absentee owners.

The heads of these corporations have no interest whatever in the development and progress of the people of Porto Rico. Their goal is to amass wealth, and they apply themselves to this end with whole-hearted interest. They are constantly disputing our tax laws and complaining of the share in the expenses of our Government which we assign to them. The wages of labor, in spite of the tariff, are very low, while cost of living, because of the tariff, is very high. In Porto Rico rice, for instance, is a staple food. Our peasants consume it daily. While the rich are deriving extraordinary benefits from the tariff on sugar, the poor are suffering the grievous effects of the tariff on rice. Cost of living in Porto Rico is as high as in the United States. Nearly all necessities are imported from this country. Clothes, shoes, drugs, food, machinery, farm implements, and so forth, all this comes from the United States, and while it is true that the sugar industry receives great benefit from tariff protection it is just as true and just as evident that these benefits enrich a few and that the poor consumer has to bear the heavy burden of tariff rates on other commodities which are necessary to life itself. True, land values have increased and the price of sugar has been the principal factor in this increase of value. True, too, the treasury revenues increase with an increase in the value of property. But the disadvantages of centralization of landownership and of absentee ownership are of such a nature as to be well worth careful study and attention.

In spite of tariff protection the tobacco industry is languishing. The fruit industry at present is barely able to show anything above its costs of production, while coffee has never been in a flourishing state since the Americans arrived at the island. It is true that Porto Rican coffee is given a 20 per cent reduction of the Cuban tariff as an American product. But it is also true that we lost our market in Spain on account of the American occupation, that coffee was in those days our principal industry, and that in spite of the crisis that this industry has suffered protection has never been given to our coffee. The 20 per cent reduction of the Cuban tariff means nothing compared to the benefit we received in the past.

In matters of the tariff, Porto Rico must accept and be governed by the laws of the United States. We have not the right to make our own tariff rates. If we did, perhaps we might find some way to lower the cost of living and to find a market for our products in the world. We can not consider as final the conclusions arrived at in the President's letter. These matters which deal with a country's finances must be studied very carefully before a definite conclusion is reached.

The President's assertion that the United States has given Porto Rico greater liberties than it has ever enjoyed is undoubtedly based on the fact that the autonomous government granted by Spain in 1897 had scarcely commenced when the Spanish-American War brought it to an end. In this connection I desire to quote the following excerpt from an article written by Mr. Regis H. Post, former Governor of Porto Rico, and published in the World's Work Magazine of January, 1922:

> They had obtained a representation in the Spanish Cortes, and with this participation in the home government, and with consummate political strategy, they succeeded in November, 1897, in obtaining for the island an autonomous form of government, the goal of their desires. On July 17, 1898, the legislature elected by the people met for the first time in its history, amid the rejoicing of all elements in the island. On July 25, the day of Santiago, patron saint of Spain, the clerk read to the assembly telegrams and letters of felicitation from insular and municipal officials and prominent citizens of the island; but in the midst of the chorus of joy came a telegram which read: "The American fleet is off the port of Guanica, preparing to bombard." The legislature adjourned, never to meet again under the Spanish flag, and the work of 400 years was blown away in the breeze that raised our flag over the island.

It is a historical fact that when the Americans arrived in Porto Rico an autonomous government had already been granted to the island by the Crown of Spain. Under this law the insular parliament was composed of two chambers empowered to legislate on public education, public works and services, public health, mail, telegraph, police, public credit, banks, monetary system, agriculture, qualification of voters and electoral procedure, administrative organization, judicial, municipal and territorial division, insular budget, with the obligations of including in it the expenses inherent to the sovereignty fixed by the Spanish Parliament, commercial treaties, tariffs, land and water transportation, taxes, and duties, and in general on those questions affecting Porto Rico principally and which were not specifically and specially reserved to the Spanish Parliament by law.

The governor was appointed by the King, and the members of the cabinet appointed by the governor, these officials to be chosen from among the members of the political party having the majority in parliament. Porto Rico was represented in the Spanish Parliament, as in the past, by deputies and senators elected in the island, with the same rights and privileges as those enjoyed by the Spanish representatives. These are the principal features of the powers granted to the Porto Ricans 31 years ago by the old mother country.

The President says, in connection with the powers enjoyed by the people of Porto Rico, the following:

> The Porto Rican government at present exercises a greater degree of sovereignty over its own internal affairs than does the government of any State or Territory of the United States.
> The principal difference between the government of Porto Rico and that of the organized and incorporated Territories of the United States is the greater power of the legislature and the fiscal provisions governing Porto Rico, which are far more liberal than those of any of our States or Territories.

In the States of the Union sovereignty emanates from the people. The constitutions of the States and the Constitution of the United States are based on this principle. National sovereignty has its origin and strength in the powers delegated by the sovereign States of the Nation. The united power of the States constitutes the national sovereignty. The powers not delegated constitute the State sovereignty. Thus, the power of the States is only limited by the restrictions imposed by themselves in the exercise of their sovereignty. The States made the Constitution and are empowered to change it. Quoting the language of Sir George C. Lewis—

> It may be said generally that a sovereign government can do all that can be done by the united power of the community which it governs; or, more strictly, that it can do all that can be done by so much of the power of the community as it can practically command.

Because the customs duties in Porto Rico accrue to the local treasury and not to the National Treasury, because the income tax laws and other fiscal laws of the United States are not extended to Porto Rico, the President arrives at the surprising conclusion that the Porto Rican Government exercises a greater degree of sovereignty over its own internal affairs than does the government of any State or Territory. It is not a difficult task to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the President's conclusions are not justified by the facts. The participation given to the people of Porto Rico under the present organic law in the management of the finances of the island is very restricted. This law contains limitations that are not found in the laws of any State or Territory.

In the first place, under the organic law of Porto Rico, the power of veto is vested in the governor and the President of the United States. They both have the absolute power of vetoing any law passed by the Porto Rican Legislature. The decision of the President is always final. In Hawaii and Alaska the governor has the usual veto power; but the legislature has also the power to override a veto by a two-thirds vote of all the members of each house. Under these circumstances it can not properly be stated that our Government exercises a greater degree of sovereignty over its own affairs than Hawaii and Alaska or any State of the Union.

According to section 34 of our organic act, when a bill that has been passed is presented to the governor for his signature, if he approves the same, he shall sign it; or if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the house in which it originated, which house shall enter his objections at large on its journal and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration, two-thirds of all the members of each house shall agree to pass the same, it shall be sent to the governor, who, in case he shall then not approve, shall transmit the same to the President of the United States. If the President of the United States approves the same, he shall sign it and it shall become a law. If he shall not approve same, he shall return it to the governor, so stating, and it shall not become a law.

It is evident that under these provisions the Executive has an extraordinary power. As has been stated, the veto power is exercised by the governor or the President, as the case may be. Without their approval, no bill of the legislature shall become a law, no appropriation may be passed. It may be said by the administration that very seldom an appeal is taken. It may be said by the Porto Ricans that an appeal to the President is equivalent to an affirmance of the governor's decision, as it is but natural to expect that the President will not revoke his own appointee. But that is not the point. The fact is that the Legislature of Porto Rico, elected by the people, has no power to pass a law over the veto of the executive branch of the government, in the selection of which our people have no voice.

Under section 34 of our organic law the governor has entire control in the preparation of the budget and can eliminate any item approved by the legislature, his decision being final. The organic law practically gives the governor the power to make the budget of Porto Rico. The legislature is in this case nothing more than a debating society. Once the budget is returned to the governor by the legislative assembly he may approve some items and disapprove others, and we have no recourse under the law against his decision. No governor of any territory under the flag has such powers. A government which grants such arbitrary faculties to a single person can scarcely be considered free and democratic.

Under the organic law the auditor of Porto Rico, also appointed by the President of the United States, is vested with extraordinary powers. He examines, adjusts, decides, audits, and settles all accounts and claims pertaining to the revenues and receipts from whatever source of the government of Porto Rico and of the municipal funds derived from bond issues. It is his duty to bring to the attention of the proper administrative officers expenditures of funds or property which in his opinion are extravagant, excessive, unnecessary, or irregular. He has supervision of all the departments of the government, and his decisions are final unless an appeal is taken to the governor. The decision of the governor in such a case shall be final, subject to such right of action as may be otherwise provided by law. No Federal law has yet been passed providing a right of action against the decision of the governor. In the States of the Union, as in the Federal Government, the decisions of the Comptroller General are binding only upon the executive branches of the Government. The organic law of Porto Rico simply says that the decision of the auditor is final in the absence of an appeal, and that the decision of the governor is final when an appeal is taken to him.

In the States the executive is elected by the people; in Porto Rico, appointed by the President of the United States. The people of Porto Rico have not any voice in the election of the President. The power to appoint our executive is therefore not derived from the sovereign power of the people of Porto Rico. A republican form of government has been defined by American authorities as one which derives all its powers directly or indirectly from the people, and which is administered by persons holding their offices for a limited period or during good behavior. The people of Porto Rico have no voice directly or indirectly in the election of the President of the United States or in the appointment of the Governor of Porto Rico. This power, which is one of the most sacred under American institutions, is not enjoyed by the people of the island. Notwithstanding the absence of this right, which is fundamental under a democratic government, the President asserts that we enjoy a greater degree of sovereignty than a State.

Had the people of Porto Rico possessed the power of electing their governor, the selection of a man speaking a language not understood by our people should have never taken place. It is hardly possible to define as democratic a system of government which allows the appointment of an executive who does not even understand the language of the people he is going to rule. It is interesting to contemplate what the State of Massachusetts would do in case of the appointment by another power of a governor speaking only the Spanish language and ignorant of the customs of the country. It is interesting to imagine what would be the reaction of the people in approaching the governor through an interpreter, as it is done in Porto Rico. The majority of our people can only communicate with the executive through the agency of a third person. Under the circumstances the governor is unable to grasp the real psychology of the people and to obtain direct information from them. The executive, by his inability to communicate directly with the people he is sent to govern, surrounds himself with a group of individuals on whom he depends for information regarding insular affairs. This group of individuals who are always ready to use this high privilege for their own personal benefit are responsible for the disagreeable misunderstandings that often take place between the governor and the people.

Under our organic law the President appoints the attorney general and the commissioner of education, two members of the governor's cabinet. In the States these officials are either appointed or elected by the people. The attorney general, appointed by the President, is in charge of the administration of justice. The commissioner of education supervises public education throughout the island. He prepares all courses of study subject to the approval of the governor. Under this provision the Legislature of Porto Rico has no authority to change, alter, or modify the courses of study prepared by the commissioner of education and approved by the governor. They are both presidential appointees, in whose selection the people of Porto Rico have no voice.

The President appoints the justices of the Supreme Court of Porto Rico. The President has no power to appoint the justices of any State supreme court.

The organic law prohibits the Porto Rican Legislature from interfering with the organization of the Executive Council. It can neither create nor consolidate nor abolish any of the departments of the government. In the States of the Union, all of these powers are within the sovereignty of the State and can not be interfered with by the Federal Government.

The borrowing capacity of the insular government and of the municipalities is limited by the organic law. No change can be made by the local government of Porto Rico. Yet the President claims that we exercise a greater degree of sovereignty than the States.

The States are authorized to change, modify, alter, or amend their own constitutions. This is a fundamental power of the State sovereignties. Porto Rico has no power to adopt its own constitution. We had no participation in its enactment. We have no power to change or modify it. It was approved by the representation of the different States in Congress without a vote being cast by the people of Porto Rico. It so happens that the people of Porto Rico, who, according to President Coolidge, exercise a greater degree of sovereignty than the States, had to depend on the elected Representatives in Congress from these States for the enactment of the fundamental law of their country, and still depend on them for any change or modification contemplated on said law. The States of the Union have an equal representation in the Senate; Porto Rico has none. Representations in the House is apportioned among the several States; Porto Rico has no Representatives, but a Resident Commissioner entitled to a seat by the courtesy of the House and not by law. The Delegates of Alaska and Hawaii are entitled to a seat by law. The Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico lacks the power to vote in the Congress of the United States. While the representatives of the several States exercise the power of enacting legislation for Porto Rico, its accredited representative is not allowed to vote on legislation affecting his own country.

The injustice involved in the denial of this right acquires extraordinary importance when laws are passed (or bills are voted on) which are related to liberty or life, especially to life. One of the greatest grievances alleged by the American colonies to justify the revolution which culminated in independence was the imposition of taxes without the representation of the taxpayers. It was the contention of the colonists that the king had no just power to demand his people's money except by consent of the men whom they should elect to represent them in Parliament. "Taxation without representation is tyranny" was the slogan of the American patriots. The English legislation which provoked the protest of the American people dealt exclusively with property and had nothing to do with life.

The American Congress can dispose, and has disposed, of Porto Rican lives without our vote or representation. We are not complaining of Congress' action at the time. We are merely stressing a principle. During the World War Porto Rico did not have a representative in Congress with the authority to vote on the draft law. Congress passed the law disposing of the lives of the people of Porto Rico without our vote. The phrase, "taxation without representation," dwindles into insignificance when compared to the phrase, "compulsory service without representation." The first deals with the rights of property, the second with the sacred rights of life. Porto Rico was only too glad to offer its services to the Nation during the crisis of the World War. As a matter of fact, the draft was unnecessary in Porto Rico. The Porto Rican army could have been raised by volunteers. But the fact that we were ready to fight for the Nation does not change the principle. The American Congress disposed of our lives without giving us an opportunity to cast a vote in such a tremendous and important matter. And yet the President of the United States says that the government of Porto Rico exercises a greater degree of sovereignty than the government of any State.

The Congress of the United States has power to repeal our laws and to legislate for Porto Rico without any limitation whatever. This power vested in Congress is a cause of constant alarm to the people of Porto Rico. When Congress is in session bills are frequently introduced restricting the rights already enjoyed by the Porto Rican people. These bills, of course, are introduced without our knowledge. On the other hand, bills increasing our liberties are very seldom introduced, and when there is a Representative who sponsors legislation in favor of Porto Rico it is necessary to undertake a very active work in order to obtain a decision in our behalf. But there are always powerful interests in behalf of the bills restricting our liberties. During the present session of Congress a bill was introduced in the Senate restricting the limited powers of the Porto Rican Legislature. Another bill was introduced in the Senate and House for the relief of certain Porto Rican taxpayers, who happen to be corporations whose stockholders reside in continental United States. Another bill was introduced to prohibit experiments upon living dogs in our country. Another bill was introduced for woman suffrage, and so forth. Why should the Congress of the United States attempt to legislate for Porto Rico on purely local matters? Why should Senators and Representatives introduce bills restricting the limited liberties we enjoy? Why, for instance, should Congress attempt to tell Porto Ricans what we should do with our dogs? We in Porto Rico are so uneasy when Congress is in session that the adjournment of Congress is, for Porto Rico, a great relief.

The States of the Union are ruled by the Constitution. All powers not delegated to the Federal Government are kept by the States, and Congress has no power to legislate on local matters. They control their internal affairs and are not in any way menaced, as we are, by legislation restricting our rights. And if a bill is introduced which may encroach on the powers of the States, the Representatives of those States are in Congress to defend State rights and prevent any usurpation of power. The State rights are also protected by the courts of justice, which have the power to declare unconstitutional any law that may invade the rights of the States. As under the Constitution Congress can legislate for the Territories without limitation, we have no power to protect ourselves against any legislation applied to our country.

It has been clearly shown that Porto Rico has not yet a complete representative government. Of the three branches of the government, the legislative alone is elected by the people; while the executive and the judicial, including the attorney general and the justices of the supreme court, are appointed by the President. It is, therefore, clear that the government of the island is not an expression of the popular will. Only the legislative assembly represents the views of the people. The heads of the two other coordinate departments being presidential appointees, are not strictly accountable to the people. And yet it is said that we enjoy a greater degree of sovereignty than any State.

The treaty of Paris, says the President, contains no promise to the people of Porto Rico.

> No phase of that treaty contemplated the extension to Porto Rico of a more liberal régime than existed. The United States has made no promise to the people of Porto Rico that has not been more than fulfilled; nor has any representative or spokesman for the United States made such a promise.

It is true that the treaty of peace contains no promise. Our people were transferred from one sovereignty to another, as a piece of property, without consultation and with utter disregard for their wishes. The voice of 1,000,000 people means nothing in human justice compared with the sacred rights of conquest. It is true that 30 years ago the American representatives at the peace negotiations leading to the treaty of Paris, in replying to the representatives of the Spanish Kingdom, said:

> The Congress of a country which never has enacted laws to oppress or abridge the rights of residents within its domain, and whose laws permit the largest liberty consistent with the preservation of order and the protection of property, may safely be trusted not to depart from its well-settled practice in dealing with the inhabitants of this island.

But this, of course, can not be considered a promise! We have come, said General Miles in his proclamation after landing in Porto Rico, to bring protection to you and to your property, exalting and imposing on you the guaranties and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government. But, obviously, this can not be taken as a promise either!

We have, notwithstanding, the implied promise of your principles, your sense of justice, and your institutions. That is what General Miles meant when he spoke of the guaranties and blessings of the liberal institutions of this country. The President says that no phase of the treaty of Paris contemplated the extension to Porto Rico of a more liberal régime than existed. At the time of the American occupation, a very liberal régime of government had already been granted by the Crown of Spain. There are many able lawyers and statesmen who opine that the organic law in force in Porto Rico and approved by Congress in 1917, 19 years after the American occupation, can not be favorably compared with the autonomy granted us by the Crown of Spain in 1897. When the President says that no phase of the treaty of Paris contemplated the extension to Porto Rico of a more liberal régime than existed, it clearly conveys the implication that the purpose was not to implant in Porto Rico a régime of government with less power than the one already granted by Spain. But the Congress of the United States "which never has enacted laws to oppress or abridge the rights of residents within its domain" imposed upon the Porto Rican people the organic law of 1900, which curtailed the liberal powers granted by Spain, denied American citizenship to the Porto Ricans, left them without a fatherland and without citizenship, a personality ignored by the law of nations.

The President ends his letter stating that—there is no disposition in America, and certainly not on my part, to discourage any reasonable aspiration of the people of Porto Rico.

The President further says that—the island has so improved and its people has so progressed in the last generation as to justify high hopes for the future, but it certainly is not unreasonable to ask that those who speak for Porto Rico limit their petitions to those things which may be granted without a denial of such hope.

What does the President mean by "reasonable aspiration"? Is it unreasonable for the people of Porto Rico to insist on a clear definition of their political status? Thirty years have elapsed since the Americans took possession of the island, and to this day Congress has not seen fit to clearly determine what the status of Porto Rico is or what this status will be in the future. We are wholly ignorant of what our fate is to be, and when those who speak for Porto Rico petition the President and Congress of the United States for a definition of their status in accordance with the aspirations of the people of Porto Rico, they are told to limit their petitions to those things which may be granted without a denial of their hopes.

The highest authority that may be cited with reference to the status of Porto Rico is the Supreme Court of the United States. I confess my perplexity after reading the conclusions reached by the Supreme Court when referring to our status. Let us briefly state what the Supreme Court says about our status in construing the organic law of Porto Rico of 1900, and the present organic law enacted in 1917.

The military occupation of the island ceased when, in the year 1900, Congress approved a law to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico. At this time Congress did not grant American citizenship to the Porto Ricans and created a body politic under the name of the people of Porto Rico, to be composed of Porto Rican citizens and American citizens residing therein. The approval of this law brought about many important questions with regard to our political status. These questions were passed upon by the courts of justice. A new theory was announced by the Supreme Court of the United States, classifying the Territories into incorporated and unincorporated; incorporated Territories are those which had become part of the United States proper and not merely a part of its domain, and which are entitled to the benefit of the Constitution, and which are held to be as much a part of the United States as are the States of the Union; and unincorporated Territories are those which have not been made part of the United States and to which Federal legislation does not uniformly extend. Porto Rico has been classified as an unincorporated Territory.

In the case of Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 287) the Supreme Court of the United States says:

We are therefore of the opinion that the island of Porto Rico is a Territory appurtenant and belonging to the United States, but not a part of the United States within the revenue clauses of the Constitution.

Mr. Justice White, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Shiras and Mr. Justice McKenna uniting in the judgment of affirmance, says:

* * * And in addition to the provisions of the act by which the duty here in question was imposed, taken as a whole, seem to me plainly to manifest the intention of Congress that for the present, at least, Porto Rico is not to be incorporated into the United States.

The result of what has been said is that whilst in an international sense Porto Rico was not a foreign country, since it was subject to the sovereignty of and was owned by the United States, it was foreign to the United States in a domestic sense, because the island had not been incorporated into the United States but merely appurtenant thereto as a possession.

It is hard for me to understand how Porto Rico can be foreign to the United States in a domestic sense and not foreign in an international sense. This opinion by the United States Supreme Court is an excellent example of the peculiarity of our position.

In Kopel v. Bingham (211 U. S. 468) it was held that Porto Rico is a completely organized Territory, but not a Territory incorporated into the United States. This doctrine was reaffirmed in the cases of American Railroad Co. of Porto Rico v. Didricksen (227 U. S. 145) and Porto Rico v. Rosali (227 U. S. 207, 274).

These are the most important decisions of the United States Supreme Court construing the act of April 12, 1900, "temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico," known as the Foraker Act.

The Boston court of appeals in a decision rendered several years ago says:

Porto Rico is at least a possession, and through its organized government and under the organic act of April 12, 1900, has many of the essentials of these political entities known as Territories; but, notwithstanding that, the substantial fact remains that it is an insular piece of ground, with a considerable population, many miles at sea, and widely separated from the States and Territories of the Government which is charged with the responsibility of seeing that there is a civil government in the island. Therefore, without much regard to the refinement of the question as to which it is, it is the fact that it is an insular possession or an insular Territory, whichever it is, far removed from physical relations with other Territories and possessions, and with no physical relation to any of the States. * * *

The Foraker Act was substituted by the act of Congress approved on March 2, 1917, "to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes." By this act American citizenship was granted to the citizens of Porto Rico. On the approval of this law the question of the political status of Porto Rico came again under discussion. The Federal Court of Porto Rico, in an elaborate decision, held that Porto Rico was incorporated into the United States by the new law. The Supreme Court of Porto Rico arrived at the same conclusion in a similar case. Both cases were brought to the consideration of the Supreme Court of the United States, and on January 17 and 21, of 1918, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the Federal and Supreme Courts of Porto Rico upon the authority of the cases decided in construction of the Foraker Act. According to the Supreme Court of the United States our status remained unchanged, in spite of the grant of American citizenship to the Porto Ricans.

In Balzac against Porto Rico, decided by the United States Supreme Court in October, 1921, Chief Justice Taft, who rendered the decision of the court, says:

The insular cases reveal much diversity of opinion in this court as to the constitutional status of the territory acquired by the treaty of Paris (December 10, 1898, 30 Stat. L. 1754), ending the Spanish war; but the Dorr case shows that the opinion of Mr. Justice White of the majority in Downes v. Bidwell has become the settled law of the court.

* * * * * * *

The section of the Jones Act which counsel press on us is paragraph 5. This in effect declares that all persons who, under the Foraker Act, were made citizens of Porto Rico and certain other residents shall become citizens of the United States unless they prefer not to become such, in which case they are to declare such preference within six months and thereafter they lose certain political rights under the new government. In the same section the United States district court is given power separately to naturalize individuals of some other classes of residents. * * * Unaffected by the considerations already suggested, perhaps the declaration of paragraph 5 would furnish ground for an inference such as counsel for plaintiff in error contend; but, under the circumstances, we find it entirely consistent with nonincorporation. When Porto Ricans passed from under the Government of Spain they lost the protection of that Government as subjects of the the King of Spain, a title by which they had been known for centuries. They had a right to expect, in passing under the dominion of the United States, a status entitling them to the protection of their new sovereign. In theory and in law they had it as citizens of Porto Rico, but it was an anomalous status, or seemed to be so, in view of the fact that those who owed and rendered allegiance to the other great world powers were given the same designation and status as those living in their respective home countries, so far as protection against foreign injustice went. It became a yearning of the Porto Ricans to be American citizens, therefore, and this act gave them the boon. What additional rights did it give them? It enabled them to move into the continental United States and become residents of any State there, to enjoy every right of any other citizen of the United States—civil, social, and political.

It is true that in the absence of other and countervailing evidence a law of Congress or a provision in a treaty acquiring territory declaring an intention to confer political and civil rights on the inhabitants of the new lands as American citizens may be properly interpreted to mean an incorporation of it into the Union, as in the case of Louisiana and Alaska. This was one of the chief grounds upon which this court placed its conclusions that Alaska had been incorporated in the Union in Rasmussen v. United States (197 U. S. 516; 49 L. ed. 862; 25 Sup. Ct. Rept. 514). But Alaska was a very different case from that of Porto Rico. It was an enormous Territory, very sparsely settled and offering opportunity for immigration and settlement by American citizens. It was on the American Continent and within easy reach of the then United States. It involved none of the difficulties which incorporation of Porto Rico presents.

The opinion of Chief Justice Taft shows that we remain to-day in the same position as we were in the past. The status of Porto Rico is still undecided. As it was said in an editorial of the Washington Post of June 23, 1924, "what the ultimate status of Porto Rico will be is a matter still lying in the capacious lap of the gods." There is no feature of the relationship between the United States and Porto Rico that is so disturbing to the Porto Rican people as this continuing uncertainty as to what our status is not only now, but what it is to be in the future. There never will be perfect tranquillity in our hearts until this all-important question is settled once and for all.

This uncertainty brings as a result a divided public opinion; some of the people advocating independence, others statehood, and others full self-government. We are not to be blamed for the different views that are striking our minds. It is not our fault. If there is any fault at all it belongs exclusively to the doubtful position we are left in through the failure of the American Congress to define our status. According to the Supreme Court we are an organized Territory, but not incorporated into the United States. The high tribunal has established a distinction between organization and incorporation. Our status, therefore, is extremely peculiar. Are we foreigners? No; because we are American citizens, and no citizen of the United States can be a foreigner within the boundaries of the Nation. Are we a part of the Union? No; because we are an unincorporated Territory under the rulings of the Supreme Court. Can you find a proper definition for this organized and yet unincorporated Territory, for this piece of ground belonging to but not forming part of the United States? Under the rulings of the courts of justice we are neither flesh, fish, nor fowl. We are neither a part nor a whole. We are nothing; and it seems to me that if we are not allowed to be a part of the Union we should be allowed to be a whole entity with full and complete control of our internal affairs. And we see no reason why the President or the Congress of the United States should feel offended or embarrassed when we make a plea for a definite status and complete control of our internal affairs.

According to the Supreme Court of the United States we are merely a possession. We are designated by this odious name in the official records of the Nation. The President in his address before the Pan American conference at Habana said that 30 years ago Cuba ranked as a foreign possession and that to-day she is her own sovereign. Reference is made to the past by the President to contrast the humiliating and inferior position of Cuba as a foreign possession under the Spanish Crown with her present status. "Thirty years ago Cuba ranked as a foreign possession," says the President. How does Porto Rico rank to-day? The Supreme Court of the United States seems to have answered this question: We are a possession foreign to the United States in a domestic sense.

This word "possession" is most repugnant to the people of Porto Rico, as it conveys the idea that we are mere chattels subject to the pleasure of the owner. We are human beings and not property to be possessed by anybody or any nation in the world. The fathers of this country never dreamed of an empire with possessions foreign to the United States in a domestic sense, belonging to but not forming part of the Union. For the sake of democracy and justice, for the good name and prestige of this great Republic, and for the happiness and welfare of our people, the United States should not postpone any further the granting of a decent status to the people of Porto Rico. You have to face this problem with courage, intelligence, and statesmanship. You can not escape the responsibilities assumed by this country when the American flag was raised in Porto Rico. You can not be democratic at home and autocratic abroad. You can not have a democracy within the continental limits of the United States and an empire in the so-called insular possessions. You have to be consistent with your principles. If not, you should discontinue the teachings of American ideals in Porto Rico, as it is unfair and cruel to instill in the minds of the Porto Ricans the principles of democracy and the liberal institutions of this country and deny them at the same time a decent status in the establishment of a government based under these principles.

There are three solutions to be considered by the American Government in dealing with Porto Rico: Statehood, independence, complete autonomy.

The issue of statehood has been and is constantly discussed in the island. While it is true that there are prominent Porto Ricans in favor of this solution, others feel that it is not feasible and oppose it, claiming that if granted it will not bring about the happiness of Porto Rico. The granting of statehood is a serious problem and should be carefully considered here both from the American and the Porto Rican point of view.

It is my belief that the continental Americans and the Porto Ricans who favor statehood have not studied the problem carefully. Before committing ourselves to an opinion on such a transcendental question we should consider its consequences. We constitute a country of 1,500,000 inhabitants, with our own history, our own personality, our own customs, and speaking our own language. There is no similarity between continentals and Porto Ricans from a racial point of view. The habits, customs, characteristics, idiosyncrasies, ideology, and ethnology of the two peoples are fundamentally different. The mental processes of the two races differ widely. Under the circumstances, one should hardly expect unity in thought, feeling, or action were the two races brought together.

Language is a factor of unquestioned importance. The masses of the people of Porto Rico speak no other language but Spanish. The English language is known by some prominent men and by a number of young people educated in our secondary schools and higher institutions of learning. These young people can not handle the language of Shakespeare with the same ease as the language of Cervantes, and they naturally prefer their own language to any other. In the heart of the country, in the mountains, Spanish alone is spoken. English has not yet reached the heart of the people, nor is it reasonable to expect this ever to come about. The language of a people constitutes the voice of its soul, the means of expressing its feelings, and its personality. Love for the vernacular is ingrained in the individual. To deprive him of his native tongue would be heartless and cruel.

I have heard some continentals say that Porto Rico will be admitted to the Union as a State only when all the Porto Ricans are speaking English. This is absolutely impossible. Spanish will never be driven out of use in Porto Rico. It is our language and we will speak it as long as Porto Rico exists. The American people should realize this fact. If the disappearance of the Spanish be considered a requisite to the attainment of statehood, we wish to tell the American people frankly that we can not accept it at such a price. We realize that statehood is a great honor, but we want for our country a solution of its political problem which without breaking the bonds uniting us to the American people, will secure the happiness of the people of Porto Rico.

Our island can not be governed by the same laws which are in force in the States of the Union. Laws must be adapted to the customs and conditions of the country where they are to be enforced. Legislation which might be very beneficial in continental United States might turn out to be ruinous in the island of Porto Rico. We need our own special laws for our development, and these laws we can only frame under a completely autonomous government. Statehood would only plunge us into great difficulties.

Governor Post, in his article on Porto Rico, already mentioned, says the following in opposition to the granting of statehood to the island:

> I am opposed to this more as a citizen of New York than as a friend of Porto Rico. It would be unwise to admit 8 or 10 Congressmen and 2 Members of the United States Senate into participation in the control of our Nation until such time as the Porto Ricans have demonstrated a real affection for our country, and a real knowledge and appreciation of our institutions. It is absurd to say that a people are unfit to govern themselves and yet invite them to come in and govern us. To-day the Porto Ricans' interest is centered in his own island, rather than in the United States. We have seen in recent years situations in the United States Senate where the welfare, almost the very existence, of this country depended upon the vote of one or two Members, and we are not in a position to admit into that body two Senators whose primary allegiance would be to their island and whose sympathies and prejudices are not our own. When individual foreigners enter into American communities and mingle in everyday life with the American population and yet fail to become American in the atmosphere of America, we can not expect an alien people, speaking a foreign tongue, separated by geographical, traditional, and racial barriers from the American continent, to succeed where the foreign colonies of New York, Boston, and Chicago have failed.

The views expressed by Chief Justice Taft in the case of Balzac against Porto Rico are of no less importance. With reference to the incorporation of Alaska into the United States, the Chief Justice says that Alaska was a very different case from that of Porto Rico; that it was an enormous territory, very sparsely settled, and offering opportunity for immigration and settlement by American citizens; it was on the American continent and within easy reach of the then United States; it involved none of the difficulties which incorporation of Porto Rico presents.

Let us further quote from his opinion another paragraph which seems to me very important:

We need not dwell on another consideration which requires us not lightly to infer from acts thus easily explained on other grounds an intention to incorporate in the Union these distant ocean communities of a different origin and language from those of our continental people. Incorporation has always been a step, and an important one, leading to statehood. Without, in the slightest degree, intimating an opinion as to the wisdom of such a policy—for that is not our province—it is reasonable to assume that when such a step is taken, it will be begun and taken by Congress deliberately and with clear declaration of purpose, and not left a matter of mere inference or construction.

Chief Justice Taft refers to the difficulties which the incorporation of Porto Rico presents and says that incorporation has always been a step, and an important one, leading to statehood.

Thus spoke Hon. William H. Taft, as a member of the United States Supreme Court. While refraining from intimating an opinion as a member of this body he, however, as President of the United States, expressed his views very clearly on the matter of our status. In his message to the Sixty-second Congress, December, 1912, President Taft said:

The failure to grant American citizenship continues to be the only ground of dissatisfaction. I believe that the demand for citizenship is just. But it should be remembered that the demand must be, and in the minds of most Porto Ricans is, entirely disassociated from, any thought of statehood. I believe that no substantial approved public opinion in the United States or in Porto Rico contemplates statehood for the island as the ultimate form of relation between us. I believe that the aim to be striven for is the fullest possible allowance of legal and fiscal self-government, with American citizenship as the bond between us; in other words, a relation analogous to the present relation between Great Britain and such self-governing colonies as Canada and Australia.

Other prominent Americans, among them the late Chauncey M. Depew, former Secretary of State Root, H. G. Wells, and others have expressed the same views.

I, for myself, believe that statehood is not a good solution, either for the people of the United States or for the people of Porto Rico.

Another solution is independence. There is also an important element in Porto Rico favoring this ideal. In fact, this was the ideal of Porto Ricans during the Spanish régime. We never receded in our struggle for freedom. My predecessor, Luis Muñoz Rivera, was indicted forty-two times for defending the liberty of his country.

The ideal of independence has always been very dear to the Porto Rican people. In fact, it is the feeling predominating in the island. But there are many Porto Ricans who believe that they can secure this independence under the American flag without breaking the ties that bind us to this country. These Porto Ricans accepted American citizenship without mental reservations, and their loyalty is unquestioned. However, they can not conceal their resentment when an attempt is made to describe our island as an orphan institution wholly dependent on the charitableness of the United States for its salvation. They are and expect to remain American, but not at the expense of their honor and dignity—not at the cost of such a great price. But if we are treated by the American people as equals, and a decent status is granted to the Porto Ricans which will allow them the complete control of their local affairs, I feel sure that the people of the island would be satisfied and content under the jurisdiction of the United States. Our objective is full self-government, not separation from this country.

In my opinion the best solution is complete autonomy. Porto Rico has a right to work out its own destiny. The constitution of Porto Rico should be drafted in San Juan and not in Washington, as the constitution of Canada was drafted in Ottawa and not in London. I have introduced a bill in the House authorizing the island of Porto Rico to form for itself a constitution and government under the jurisdiction of the United States. This constitution will take effect as the organic law of the island when approved by Congress. As it will be adopted by the people of Porto Rico only with the full approval of Congress, it would be possible to inaugurate a system of government in harmony with the interests of the United States and the aspirations of the people of Porto Rico.

Speaking of complete autonomy, Governor Post has this to say:

This solution appeals to me as being feasible and less dangerous to the United States and to Porto Rico; that is, to carry out bravely the experiment which we have muddled soft-heartedly and soft-headedly, and give to the island, under the flag of the United States, complete autonomy. Let us adopt some form of government similar to that of Canada, or other self-governing dominion of the British Empire. We did not hesitate to benefit by English experience in first establishing our civil government, but we chose to adopt the plan of a crown colony. Let it be clearly understood that the people of Porto Rico are governing their own island in their own way, through their own duly elected or appointed representatives; that the supreme American authority in the island is merely there to represent the United States and to protect American and foreign interests, and will not be responsible for mistakes or have credit for success in local affairs. Let it be clearly understood both at home and abroad that the Porto Rican alone is responsible for the political stability and economic welfare of his island, just as the citizen of New York, Illinois, Georgia, or Texas is responsible for the welfare of his own State. If he does well, the whole island will benefit, and he is entitled to have the credit therefor. But if he fails, he can not hide behind the coat tails of the titular American governor, who is forced into being either a figurehead or a "wrench thrown in the machinery."

* * * * * * *

If this system were adopted and honestly and fearlessly carried out for a term of years, I believe that it would eliminate practically all the sentimental objections and irritations now existing, and leave the Porto Rican free to judge and to appreciate the real fundamental benefits which he receives from his connection with the United States. This appreciation will lead him also to realize how suicidal an attempt at an independent national existence would be in the end; and slowly, but I believe surely, he would become a true American citizen in fact as well as in name

But it is said by the President that a greater grant of autonomy will not permit us to improve the economic position of our Government or our people. I have heard this argument on many occasions in official circles, and especially in the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

I have also heard that because Porto Rico does not pay Federal taxes it should feel satisfied and not insist in asking for a greater grant of autonomy. Nothing hurts the feelings of the Porto Rican people more than this disgusting reference to dollars and cents in the discussion of matters directly affecting the liberties of their country. Those who so speak have not been able yet to understand the psychology of our people where human rights and liberties have more weight than the almighty dollar.

On the other hand, there are others who, after giving this matter careful consideration, have arrived at a different conclusion. As an illustration, I wish to further quote the following from Governor Post's article on Porto Rico:

The love of self-government is not dependent upon material prosperity; it seems to be inborn and ingrained in all people, especially, we like to think, in the American people. I do not suppose that anyone would question for an instant that if Germany had been successful in the late war and New York City had been placed under the rule of an imperial administrator, trained in the school of municipal government of Germany and responsible only for results to the Imperial Government in Berlin, that the city of New York would be infinitely more honestly and efficiently administered than it has been for the past four years; yet I doubt that the people of New York would be satisfied to be governed from Berlin. In any city the surest political slogan that can be raised is "home rule" against outside domination, and even the more intelligent resent reforms imposed by superior state or national authority.

As an argument against granting to Porto Rico a more autonomous government, it is said that at the time of the American occupation the island was without experience or training in self-government, and that it has been given greater liberty than it has ever enjoyed and powers of government for the exercise of which its people are barely prepared.

The President is rather severe in his description of conditions in Porto Rico at the time of the American occupation, when he says:

We found the people of Porto Rico poor and distressed, without hope for the future, ignorant, poverty-stricken, and diseased, not knowing what constituted a free and democratic government, and without the experience of having participated in any government. We have progressed in the relief of poverty and distress, in the eradication of disease, and have attempted with some success to inculcate in the inhabitants basic ideas of a free democratic government.

Paraphrasing the words of Mr. Coolidge, we might well counter with this:

We found the people of the United States rich and powerful, with great hope for the future, educated and healthful but not knowing what constituted a free and democratic government in dependent countries and without the experience of having participated in any colonial system of government.

The English historian, Froude, states that all history has demonstrated that self-governing democracies are incapable of properly administering the government of colonial possessions. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. The United States does not suffer from the inexperience of Porto Rico in self-government, but Porto Rico suffers from the inexperience of the United States in governing others. To govern Porto Rico or any other country properly would require more time and attention than busy legislators thousands of miles away are willing to give to the subject.

Our inexperience, however, can not be compared with the inexperience of the people of this country to administer our local affairs. And this lack of experience on your part is not a reflection on the people of the United States. The creation of an empire was something beyond the expectations of the founders of this great Republic. It was unnecessary, therefore, to specialize in the study of problems which were never expected to be faced.

The acquisition of Alaska in 1867 did not involve a serious problem of government, as it was a vast territory inhabited by only 30,000 people, about 60 per cent of whom were uncivilized. It was not until the acquisition of Hawaii, Philippine Islands, and Porto Rico, that the United States was practically initiated in the government of outlying territories. America, untrained in the government of foreign countries, and unfamiliar with conditions prevailing in the newly acquired Territories, was suddenly faced with the new responsibility of administering foreign dependencies traditionally the cause of turmoil for the old and experienced monarchies of Europe.

With the acquisition of these Territories, a new policy of expansion was inaugurated by America. With regard to my own country you are charged now with the duty of studying our conditions and of establishing a republican form of government satisfactory to the people and conducive to our happiness.

It seems to me that the American people have not yet realized the importance of this problem. The lack of knowledge of our problems, which was but natural at the time of the American occupation of our country, can not be further justified after the expiration of 30 years of American control. And it is only fair to state that no special effort has been made by those intrusted with the destinies of Porto Rico to study the intricate problems which surround us or even to obtain in a general way a comprehensive knowledge of conditions in the island. This is one of the greatest handicaps we have to overcome.

In expressing these views I have not in mind any executive branch of the Government. The responsibility is placed by the Constitution in Congress, which is the highest tribunal with jurisdiction over our country. And what has been your experience in the local affairs of Porto Rico? Are any of you specially acquainted with the habits, customs, and psychology of our people; with the economic, social, and political problems of the island and the complexion and structure of our Government?

If there is any Member of the House with such qualifications, I invite him to arise. None of you, I dare say, are so qualified. Certainly you have not deemed it necessery to dedicate even part of your time to the study of our needs and problems. I can easily understand your indifference to these matters. You have no time to spare for Porto Rico. You are Members of the greatest legislative body in the world, where matters of national and international interest are constantly occupying your attention. Besides, it is but natural, and I might add even your solemn duty, to devote the preponderance of your time to the interest of your respective districts. That is not in any manner intended as a criticism, but as a statement of fact which I believe all gentlemen here fully recognize. But it explains why none of you can claim special knowledge on insular affairs.

I do not blame you as much for your indifference as for your delay in recognizing the rights of the people of Porto Rico to the control, without your intervention, of our internal affairs. You should not attempt to rule a far-distant territory without previously and conscientiously exhausting all sources of information and without a thorough personal knowledge of the people and conditions prevailing in such territory. Under these circumstances, justice and wisdom advise that you should refrain from interfering in our local affairs and fully recognize that the right to the management of our problems is inherently and necessarily ours.

No Member of this House or the Senate can claim more qualifications to legislate for Porto Rico than the members of the Porto Rican Legislature. No Member of either House can allege that a man from Oklahoma, Illinois, Indiana, or any other State, appointed by the President, will be more qualified than a Porto Rican selected by the people to exercise the executive functions of the government of our island.

Yet you have not conceded to the people of Porto Rico the right to elect the governor, in spite of the fact that we have been for years knocking at the doors of Congress for the recognition of this right.

There is in the island of Porto Rico an abundance of excellent material from which to select a good executive. There are men who not only are familiar with the Spanish and English languages, but who also have the advantage of knowing American institutions and, of course, the people of their country. A man sent from the States lacks these requirements. In the first place, the Spanish language is unknown to him, he is not acquainted with the people, does not know their customs and psychology, and naturally can not be an efficient executive, especially in the first period of his administration. Besides, it is only natural that we should have the aspiration of electing our own executive, because we consider that our inherent right. As the Porto Ricans are American citizens, they naturally resent and protest against the exclusion of one of their number, if the objection to the granting of the right of electing an insular man to the governorship is that he will be a native of the country.

It may be said that the Governor of Canada, Australia, and other British Dominions, is appointed by the home government. This is true, but there is no similarity in the policy followed by England and the United States in the outlying territories, and besides there is a great difference between the two systems of government. In these British dominions the governor is appointed by England, but only after the people to be governed have indicated their approval of the appointment. Porto Rico never had the opportunity to express approval or disapproval, because our country is not consulted in the appointment of the executive. In Canada and Australia the governor is to a great extent an ornamental figure. The real executive is the Premier, who is always a leader of the party having a majority in Parliament. The executive, therefore, is elected by the people. Under the American system the governor is the executive; that is to say, he is himself the most powerful factor of the government, and the people to be governed have no voice in his selection.

President Coolidge says that the progress made by the people of Porto Rico justifies high hopes for the future. It is my opinion that this progress justifies at the present time the granting of full governing powers to the people of Porto Rico. The argument of inexperience can not be successfully advanced. This argument, which is as old as the world, was frequently used by the old monarchies of Europe as an excuse for their intervention in the internal affairs of small countries. Will the young Republic of America resort to the same old argument? Not for long, I hope. We believe in the United States of America. We believe that this country will always keep faith with the principles enunciated by Jefferson, Madison, and Lincoln.

The President rather underestimates our ability for learning when he says that the United States has attempted with some success to inculcate in the inhabitants of the island the basic idea of a free, democratic government. It is not with some success merely, but with really remarkable success, that we have been taught to believe in the principles of a free, democratic government. If we have taken your lessons too seriously, certainly it is not our fault, and no blame should be placed on us on that account.

I do not want you, however, to entertain the idea that we learned to fight for freedom under the American flag. Love for liberty is inherent in our race. We energetically protested against oppression under the Spanish régime. We constantly demanded the recognition of our rights. We never yielded to force. Our patriots were persecuted; our press was muzzled; our lives menaced. We, notwithstanding, persisted in our efforts to build up for ourselves a country where we could live in decency and honor, but when, after a long and continuous struggle, autonomy was granted to Porto Rico by Spain, the soldiers of America landed on our soil, and, as Governor Post says, "the work of 400 years was blown away in the breeze that raised the American flag over the island."

In the course of his address before the Pan American Conference at Habana, President Coolidge gave utterance to high and lofty motives worthy of the best traditions of American history. Typical of the sentiments expressed in the immortal Declaration of Independence were these words:

> Our most sacred trust has been, and is, the establishment and expansion of the spirit of democracy. * * * We have put our confidence in the ultimate wisdom of the people. We believe we can rely on their intelligence, their honesty, and their character. We are thoroughly committed to the principle that they are better fitted to govern themselves than anyone else is to govern them. * * * It is better for the people to make their own mistakes than to have someone else make their mistakes for them.

Such was the noble utterance of the President in the presence of the representatives of the Pan American nations. Certainly no one will contend that he had any other motive than to convince his hearers that such indeed were his convictions. What I can not understand, in view of the President's pronouncements, is his apparent determined insistence to follow a diametrically opposed policy in his dealings with the people of Porto Rico, where he has the best opportunity that he will ever have during his term in office to show the sincerity of his expressed belief that the people are the best and safest guardians of their own destiny.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I shall now conclude. In doing so, I must say frankly that I have been deeply hurt by the President's letter. In my country I have always defended the good intentions of the United States toward Porto Rico. For my policy in this regard I offer no apology, and do not desire now to be understood as offering any.

If a man affronts me individually, Mr. Chairman, I can possibly ignore it. But if it is my country that is affronted, I can not ignore it. I am hurt, and if the affront is unjustified, I must answer it to the best of my ability. I must do this whatever the consequences may be, politically or otherwise.

I have not meant to be harsh, gentlemen of the House. I have only meant to be frank. If I were not frank, I would neither be fair to you, to my country, nor to myself.

I ask you, gentlemen, individually and collectively, to put yourselves in my place, and to give my views that sympathetic and fair consideration that you would ask for yourselves in similar circumstances. I ask at your hands only that fair play for which the American Congress is justly distinguished above all similar parliamentary bodies on this earth. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. With pleasure.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state, if he has not already done so, how many of the officials in Porto Rico are from the United States?

Mr. DAVILA. Well, we have the governor, the auditor of Porto Rico, the attorney general, and, of course, all the Federal officers are appointed by the President. The commissioner of education is appointed by the President and the justices of the supreme court are appointed by the President.

Mr. DYER. Are they Porto Ricans?

Mr. DAVILA. Two of the justices of the supreme court are continental Americans and the other three are Porto Ricans.

Mr. DYER. Then you have been making progress in that respect; that is, your own native Porto Ricans have been assuming the responsibilities of the government and of the courts, have they not?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes; and we have done that with great success.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman feels satisfied you could go even further than that and take over other offices, including the governor?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes; beyond any question.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. What is the population of Porto Rico?

Mr. DAVILA. I suppose to-day we have 1,500,000 people, or nearly that.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Do I understand it is the gentleman's idea that the island of Porto Rico should have the same form of independence and the same form of government that the island of Cuba has to-day?

Mr. DAVILA. No, sir. We do not want to separate from the United States. If independence is granted to Porto Rico we will accept independence, but we are not asking for a separation. What we want is an autonomous government under American jurisdiction and under the American flag. If the American people believe we are good enough to be their fellow citizens we would be glad to be considered as such on the basis of strict equality, but if you do not feel that way, the only honest and fair course for you to pursue is to grant Porto Rico its independence. We will never accept anything that will mean inferiority under the American flag.

Mr. SIROVICH. Are you willing to accept complete statehood for Porto Rico, the same as any other State in the Union?

Mr. DAVILA. If you grant us statehood I am sure Porto Rico will accept statehood. That is my opinion, but according to the views of prominent Americans statehood is perhaps not the best solution for the United States or for Porto Rico, but an autonomous government. However, if you grant us statehood it is my honest belief that Porto Rico will be glad to accept such great honor in spite of the financial difficulties that we will be bound to meet.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. DYER. How many of the people in Porto Rico vote at the elections?

Mr. DAVILA. Well, I believe it is about 80 per cent, or more than that; at any rate, more than in the United States, on the average. I am sure that the average in Porto Rico is more than the average in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the letter addressed by President Coolidge to Governor Towner, the reply of the Porto Rican leaders, and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter and reply referred to are as follows:

HON. HORACE M. TOWNER,
Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.

DEAR GOVERNOR: I desire to acknowledge the concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Porto Rico committed to Colonel Lindbergh on his visit to San Juan and also a cablegram dated January 19, signed by Messrs. Barcelo and Tous Soto, the president of the Senate and speaker of the House of Representatives of Porto Rico, respectively.

The cablegram and resolution seem to be based largely on a complete misunderstanding of concrete facts. It would not be difficult to show that the present status of Porto Rico is far more liberal than any status of its entire history; that its people have greater control of their own affairs with less interference from without; that its people enjoy liberty and the protection of law; and that its people and its government are receiving material assistance through its association with the continental United States. The treaty of Paris, of course, contains no promise to the people of Porto Rico. No phase of that treaty contemplated the extension to Porto Rico of a more liberal régime than existed. The United States has made no promise to the people of Porto Rico that has not been more than fulfilled, nor has any representative or spokesman for the United States made such a promise.

The Porto Rican government at present exercise a greater degree of sovereignty over its own internal affairs than does the government of any State or Territory of the United States. Without admitting the existence of "a grave economical situation" in the finances of the government of Porto Rico, the present difficulty, which it is hoped is but temporary, is exclusively the result of the exercise by the elected representatives of the people of Porto Rico of an authority granted by the present very liberal organic law. The responsibility of the United States, as distinguished from that of Porto Rico, is, at most, that officers appointed by the President in Porto Rico may not have exercised power legally placed in their hands to veto or make ineffective acts of the Porto Rican Legislature.

The cablegram complains that—

"Ours is the only Spanish-American country whose voice has not been heard at Habana during the Pan American Conference, for it was not represented there."

This is a most serious error and is based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the relation of Porto Rico to the United States. No State or Territory of the Union was represented as such at Habana, but the representation of the United States in Habana represents Porto Rico as truly as it represents any part of the territory of the United States.

The request is made that Porto Rico be constituted as a "free State" and not "a mere subjected colony." Certainly giving Porto Rico greater liberty than it has ever enjoyed and powers of government for the exercise of which its people are barely prepared can not, with propriety, be said to be establishing therein "a mere subjected colony." The people of Porto Rico are citizens of the United States with all the rights and privileges of other citizens of the United States, and these privileges are those which we invoked "when declaring for independence at the memorable convention at Philadelphia."

In answering the cablegram, it might be well to consider briefly the conditions and tendencies we found in Porto Rico and what the situation in Porto Rico is to-day, as well as the steps we are responsible for in Porto Rico to better conditions as we found them and as they exist to-day.

There is no conflict of opinion as to the condition in which we found Porto Rico. Perhaps the best authority on local conditions was Dr. Cayetano Coll y Toste, who, in an article published in Porto Rico in 1897, after describing the progress in Porto Rico for 100 years ending with that year, thus describes the great body of the population of Porto Rico:

"Only the laborer, the son of our fields, one of the most unfortunate beings in the world, with a pale face, bare feet, lean body, ragged clothing, and feeverish look, walks indifferently, with the shadows of ignorance in his eyes, dreaming of the cock fights, the shuffle of the cards, or the prize in the provincial lottery. No; it is not possible that the tropical zone produces such organic anemia, this lethargy of body and soul is the offspring of moral and physical vices that drag down the spirit and lead our peasants to such a state of social degradation. In the miserable cabin, hung on a peak like a swallow's nest, this unhappy little creature comes into the world; when it opens its eyes to the light of reason it does not hear the village bell reminding him to lift his soul to the Divine One and render homage to the Creator of worlds; he hears only the hoarse cry of the cock crowing in the early morning, and then he longs for the coming of Sunday to witness the strife and knavery of the cock fights. When a man, he takes up with the first woman to be found in the neighborhood and makes her his mistress to gratify his amorous lusts. In the wretched tavern the food he finds is only the putrid salt meat, codfish filled with rotten red spots, and Indian rice; and the man who harvests the best coffee in the world, who helps to gather into the troughs the sweetest grains of nature, and takes to pasture in the fields and meadows the beautiful calves, can not raise to his lips the bit of meat, because the municipal tax places it out of his reach, and almost duplicates the price of the tainted codfish; coffee becomes to him an article of luxury through its high price, and of sugar he can only taste that filled with molasses and impurities. * * * This eternal groan of the Porto Rican laborer is an infirmity of our present-day society, and consequently it is necessary to study it and remedy it."

That the accuracy of this description was appreciated in Porto Rico was evidenced by the fact that it was awarded a prize from the Economic Society of Friends of the country.

Other contemporary testimony of prominent Porto Ricans to the same general effect is not lacking, but space forbids its inclusion.

Were this pitiable economic condition the result of a passing depression the situation would have been less hopeless, but the evidence is clear that the condition was one of long standing and that the tendency was to get worse rather than to improve. One would look in vain for a single ray of hope if Porto Rico were to continue its normal course as we found it. Health and sanitation, education, and public works were such as naturally accompanied the situation of the people pictured.

Prior to the American occupation the Porto Rican people had received practically no training in self-government or the free exercise of the franchise. While there existed a body of educated, intelligent men, the great mass of the people were without experience or training in self-government and only a small percentage could qualify as voters under very broad electoral qualifications.

The military government in its brief existence of 18 months accomplished the following:

1. Order was reestablished and an insular police force organized.

2. The more obvious burdens of taxation as they fell on the very poor people were abolished and a careful study made by an expert preparatory to the adoption of a proper revenue system for the island.

3. Such changes in the judicial system were made as were necessary to bring that system more in accordance with American procedure and with the American view of individual rights and liberty.

4. A department of education was established, boards of health were organized. The public works were reorganized, and progress in road building was greater than in all the previous history of Porto Rico.

And, finally, the government was reorganized in accordance with the act passed by Congress to establish a civil government in order that there might be a minimum of friction in changing from the military to the civil government.

Experience has shown that this organic act, though intended to be temporary, was quite up to the standard of such acts and that it gave to the people of Porto Rico a liberal form of government under which they could acquire experience in democratic government honestly administered and could enjoy all of the rights and privileges to which we are accustomed. Under it the possibility of development was great, and this possibility was realized.

THE PRESENT STATUS OF PORTO RICO

Congress, recognizing the progress in Porto Rico, enacted in 1917 the present organic law. Under this law the Porto Rican people were made citizens of the United States. All of the guaranties of the Constitution are extended to Porto Rico or the Legislature of Porto Rico is granted authority to make effective those guaranties not specifically extended.

The great satisfaction in Porto Rico at the passage of this act is the best evidence of its liberality.

The principal difference between the government of Porto Rico and that of the organized and incorporated Territories of the United States is the greater power of the legislature and the fiscal provisions governing Porto Rico, which are far more liberal than those of any of our States or Territories.

GOVERNMENT FINANCES

Through the urging of the War Department, the United States income tax of 1913 was extended to Porto Rico, with a provision authorizing the modification of the law by the local legislature and directing that the income from this source go into the insular treasury.

In the revision of the organic act of Porto Rico in 1917 the War Department, with the assistance of the governor, was enabled to secure a provision similar to the one in effect in the Philippine Islands; that is, that the internal revenue collected in the United States on Porto Rican products should be turned in to the treasury of Porto Rico. These two taxes are now carried in the returns of the revenues of Porto Rico as "United States internal revenues" and "income taxes," and together they constitute a good part of the revenues of the government.

The treasury of Porto Rico receives the customs duties collected in Porto Rico, less the cost of collection. It receives the internal-revenue taxes which are laid by its own legislature and collected in Porto Rico. It receives the income taxes which are laid by its own legislature. It receives the internal-revenue taxes collected in the United States on Porto Rican products consumed in the United States.

I have set down a few scattered facts which, however, sufficiently show the consequence of Porto Rico's union with the United States. We found the people of Porto Rico poor and distressed, without hope for the future, ignorant, poverty stricken, and diseased, not knowing what constituted a free and democratic government, and without the experience of having participated in any government. We have progressed in the relief of poverty and distress, in the eradication of disease, and have attempted, with some success, to inculcate in the inhabitants the basic ideas of a free, democratic government. We have now in Porto Rico a government in which the participation by Americans from the United States is indeed small. We have given to the Porto Rican practically every right and privilege which we permitted ourselves to exercise. We have now progressed to the point where discouragement is replaced by hope, and while only 30 years ago one was indeed an optimist to see anything promising in Porto Rico, to-day one is indeed a pessimist who can see any reasonable human ambition beyond the horizon of its people.

It is not desired to leave the impression that all progress in Porto Rico was due to continental Americans. Without the cooperation and assistance of Porto Ricans progress would indeed have been negligible, but the cooperation is largely due to the encouragement of American assistance, American methods, and an increase in the reward of efforts made.

There has been a natural hesitation to recall and dwell upon the unfortunate condition of Porto Rico in the past. There is a feeling, however, that the United States is entitled to a good name in its dealing with Porto Rico and to protect itself from any reflection on its good name. Perhaps no territory in the world has received such considerate treatment in the past 30 years as has Porto Rico, and perhaps nowhere else has progress been so marked and so apparent as in Porto Rico. We are certainly entitled to a large part of the credit for this situation.

There exists to-day in Porto Rico a department of health in all respects modern and including in its activities all branches of modern public-health work. Not of least importance as showing the marked progress in health matters in Porto Rico in recent years is the fact that it is completely manned by Porto Ricans. The improvement in the health conditions of Porto Rico is not fully indicated by the reduction in death rate alone, though this rate has been almost divided by two since the early days of American sovereignty of the island. The practical eradication of smallpox, which had existed continuously in the island for over 40 years and which had resulted in over 600 deaths annually for the last 10 years prior to American sovereignty, the diagnosis of the so-called tropical "anemia" which affected the great bulk of the population of Porto Rico, the discoveries in Cuba in the method of propagating yellow fever were concrete benefits to the health situation in Porto Rico and have been of continuous benefit.

The history of education in Porto Rico prior to its occupation by the United States is very largely the history of individual effort. Individuals of character and determination would establish and conduct a school and it would generally disappear with the persons establishing it. Governmental efforts likewise lacked continuity. About the year 1860 a more determined governmental effort was made, and in 1898 the maximum of enrollment in the public schools and private schools was 29,182, which has increased to 213,321. The per capita expenditure for public education in Porto Rico has increased during the period of American sovereignty from 30 cents per annum to approximately $4 per annum. The number of government-owned public-school buildings has increased from none to 991. The department of health and the department of education of Porto Rico are combining to make of the Porto Ricans of the future a different type physically and mentally from those that we found in Porto Rico.

Not because they are entitled to first consideration, but because they are so readily measured and would be of fundamental importance in any change of status, it may be well briefly to recall some of the direct financial advantages to Porto Rico accruing from the relation to the United States.

Porto Rico pays no tax to the United States Treasury. The Federal services in Porto Rico are supported from the United States Treasury.

The services which benefit directly and financially the people of Porto Rico are the Lighthouse Service, the agricultural experiment station, and financial assistance to the college of agriculture, the maintenance of the Porto Rico regiment of the Army, the activities of the Veterans' Bureau, and Federal participation in harbor improvements. In a more general way, Porto Rico receives the protection of the Army and Navy and the service of the Department of State and its Diplomatic and Consular Service.

The expenditures from the United States accruing directly to the people of Porto Rico are not less than $5,000,000 per annum.

In the fiscal year 1927 the total operating revenue of Porto Rico was $11,191,893.11. Of this total the following, in our States and Territories, would not accrue to the local treasury:

Customs	$1,806,567.91
Income taxes	1,565,745.98
United States internal revenue	440,650.71
	3,812,964.60
Excise taxes (which would in great part not accrue to local treasury)	5,701,502.33
Total	9,514,466.93

It will be observed, therefore, that had we not given special and very considerate attention to its needs but had treated Porto Rico as we have treated the incorporated territory of the United States, of the more than $11,000,000 subject to appropriation by the elected Legislature of Porto Rico there would have been not to exceed $2,000,000 available.

The United States tariff extends to Porto Rico, and no part—certainly no agricultural part—of our territory is so favored by its tariff. And the striking development of Porto Rico under American sovereignty as shown by the growth of imports and exports is, in a material part, due to this favorable tariff treatment of its products.

The total exports from Porto Rico in the last complete year of Spanish sovereignty were $11,555,962. In the fiscal year 1927 this total was $108,067,434. The total imports in the last Spanish year were $10,725,563; and in 1927 were $98,810,750.

Comparing this with one of the most prosperous wholly independent neighbors of Porto Rico, we find that in the period in which the exterior trade of Porto Rico has been multiplied by nine that of its neighbor has been multiplied by less than seven.

The total value of Porto Rican products shipped to the United States in the fiscal year was $97,832,523, and of this total $97,000,000 was highly protected in the American market. The total purchases of Porto Rico in the markets of the United States in the same calendar year were $87,046,319. For a number of years Cuba has been the largest purchaser of Porto Rican coffee, which is given a 20 per cent reduction of the Cuban tariff as an American product, not because Cuba sells to Porto Rico but because Cuba sells to the United States.

The advantage of the United States market to Porto Rico can the better be appreciated when it is noted that of the $97,000,000 of Porto Rican products sold in the last calendar year into the United States there would have been imposed, had these products come from countries not enjoying free admission into the United States, a duty of approximately $57,000,000.

On the products from the continental United States entering Porto Rico during the same period the duty imposed, had they come from a foreign country, would have been less than one-third of this amount. Certainly Porto Rico would not desire reciprocity to be more favorable to it.

The bonded indebtedness of Porto Rico is $25,555,000 and that of the municipalities of Porto Rico $18,772,000. These bonds are practically all held in the United States. Due to the fact that these bonds are made tax exempt by a United States statute, Porto Rico pays in annual interest at least 2 per cent less than would otherwise be paid—a saving of approximately $886,540 annually.

In what way, by a greater grant of autonomy, could Porto Rico so look after the market for its products or the market for its bonds, or in what way could it improve the economic position of its government or its people?

In studying the effect of granting to Porto Rico what was requested in the cablegram sent to me, one must naturally begin with the assumption that the products of Porto Rico would be for some time approximately what they now are. The change would be in disposing of them. In the year 1926 Porto Rico sold in the United States market 1,157,000,000 pounds of sugar and received therefor $48,200,000. A near neighbor sold an equal quantity of sugar for $22,800,000. Porto Rico sold in the United States in the same year 20,500,000 pounds of leaf tobacco for $13,000,000. Its neighbor sold an equal quantity of leaf tobacco for $1,192,000. In the sale of tobacco the element of quality enters, but these numbers sufficiently show the effect of the free entry to the United States market on the two principal products of the island and show the extent to which the funds now used to make its purchases abroad and to meet its indebtedness abroad would shrink if the privilege were withdrawn. This shrinkage must be followed by a corresponding shrinkage in the revenues that go to support the activities in Porto Rico which mean progress for the future.

There is no disposition in America, and certainly not on my part, to discourage any reasonable aspiration of the people of Porto Rico. The island has so improved and its people have so progressed in the last generation as to justify high hopes for the future, but it certainly is not unreasonable to ask that those who speak for Porto Rico limit their petitions to those things which may be granted without a denial of such hope. Nor is it unreasonable to suggest that the people of Porto Rico, who are a part of the people of the United States, will progress with the people of the United States rather than be isolated from the source from which they have received practically their only hope of progress.

Sincerely yours,

(Original signed by the President.)

FEBRUARY 28, 1928.

Letter addressed by Messrs. Antonio R. Barceló, President of the Senate, and José Tous Soto, Speaker of the House of Representatives of Porto Rico, to the Resident Commissioner for Porto Rico in Washington, Hon. FÉLIX CÓRDOVA DÁVILA, replying to the letter of the President of the United States to the Hon. Horace M. Towner, Governor of Porto Rico

LEGISLATURE OF PORTO RICO IN DEFENSE OF PORTO RICO

SAN JUAN, P. R., April 2, 1928.

Hon. FÉLIX CÓRDOVA DÁVILA,

Resident Commissioner for Porto Rico, Washington, D. C.

OUR DEAR COMMISSIONER: In duty to our native country we feel bound to refer through you to the letter addressed by the President of the United States to the Governor of Porto Rico in connection with the message intrusted by our legislature to Colonel Lindbergh and with our cablegram to the President himself on occasion of the recent Pan American Conference at Habana. This reference is made through you, so that you may duly bring it to the knowledge of the President and of Congress, thus giving it the same publicity that was given the President's letter in the press of the United States and of the other countries of America.

In replying to the President's letter, with the respect due to the Chief Magistrate of the Nation, though with such frankness and sincerity as our duty demands—both to the land of our birth and to the Nation whose flag shelters us and whose citizenship we enjoy—we shall quote such paragraphs of the letter in question as require an answer on our part.

As regards "the enjoyment of individual liberty and the protection of law," we accept the statement of the President. We have never complained of lack of individual liberty. The bill of rights of the National Constitution—the latter not in force in Porto Rico—is substantially written into the organic act of March 2, 1917, granted to us by Congress. We admit, too, that "our people and our government are receiving material assistance through our association with the continental United States." This, as a matter of fact, has always been acknowledged by the island, and we have shown our recognition on different occasions.

THE PRESENT STATUS AND THE SPANISH AUTONOMIC GOVERNMENT

We can not accept, however, the statement that "the present status of Porto Rico is far more liberal than any status in its entire history." The autonomous system of government granted to Cuba and Porto Rico by Spain was more ample, more liberal in many respects, than our present political status. In support of this statement let us transcribe parts of the royal decree of November 25, 1897, "establishing self-government in the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico." (H. Doc. No. 1484, 60th Cong., 2d sess., vol. 3, p. 1843. See Exhibit I.)

COMMENT ON THE AUTONOMOUS SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

In our judgment this status was superior to the present one, because the colonial parliament had power to legislate on matters that under the Federal system pertain to the Union. Besides, the parliamentary system was the one established, and the governor general could not act, except in extraordinary instances, unless his orders were countersigned by the corresponding member of his cabinet. This cabinet, of course, was selected from among the members of the party in control of parliament.

The initiative as regards legislative measures resided in parliament as well as in the cabinet; but the cabinet was responsible to parliament and impeachable thereby. In other words, the government was placed entirely in the hands of Porto Ricans, while the governor was merely the representative of national sovereignty and exercised but such functions as were necessary to maintain the rights of the home government. As in the English self-governing commonwealths, the governor "ruled but did not govern." It is true that the upper house was not entirely elected by the people; but the same rule prevails in the powerful Dominion of Canada, which is now a member of the League of Nations and has a minister in Washington. However, the majority of the upper house was elective, and its entire membership had to be natives or residents of the island. The lower house was entirely elective.

It is also true that the governor had power to convene parliament, suspend its sessions, and dissolve it, though in this last case he was obliged to call an election to elect a new parliament; but these are characteristics of the parliamentary system which exist in most of the constitutions of continental Europe, and, of course, in the Dominion of Canada. We acknowledge, however, that our present organic act, with an elective governor, a cabinet entirely appointed by him with the consent of the senate, and containing such other amendments as are hereinafter suggested, would make an essentially republican and representative form of government superior to the Spanish autonomic character.

In his message to Congress, dated December 6, 1897, President McKinley said in connection with this autonomous charter:

"To this end Spain has decided to put into effect the political reforms heretofore advocated by the present premier, without halting for any consideration in the path which in its judgment leads to peace." This autonomy, "while guarding Spanish sovereignty, will result in investing Cuba with a distinct personality, the island to be governed by an executive and a local council or chamber, reserving to Spain the control of the foreign relations, the army and the navy, and the judicial administration." (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, Vol. XIII, p. 6257.)

CONTRAST WITH THE FIRST ORGANIC ACT

Had this been the rule during the present civil government from 1900 to 1917, much conflict between the continent and the island would have been averted. But the rule was always the opposite; the upper house was always composed of a majority of continental Americans who landed in Porto Rico in the morning and were at their desks in the Executive Council in the afternoon of the same day, to enact laws for a country they were visiting for the very first time. That is changed now. The upper house is wholly elective; but we mention the fact as a matter of history, and because of the influence it has exerted in the shaping of the insular frame of mind toward the problem of the political relations existing between continental United States and this island.

PORTO RICO AND THE STATES

The President states that "the Porto Rican government at present exercises a greater degree of sovereignty over its own internal affairs than does the government of any State or Territory of the United States."

We are forced to disagree with this statement. In the first place, the governors of the States are elected by the people of each Commonwealth. The Governor of Porto Rico is appointed by the President at will. Not even is the condition of birth or residence in Porto Rico required of the appointee; and up to the present time neither a native nor a resident of Porto Rico has ever been appointed to the high office of chief executive of the island.

In the second place, the veto power of the governor of a State may be overridden by vote of two-thirds of the membership of the legislature. The veto power of the Governor of Porto Rico is absolute. If both houses pass a law over his veto, the matter is submitted to the President for final decision.

In the third place, the States have constitutions enacted by the people themselves, while Porto Rico is ruled by an act of Congress. State constitutions can not be changed by Congress. The organic act of Porto Rico is subject to amendment at the will of Congress. The people of the States participate in the election of the President and the Vice President of the Republic. The American citizens of Porto Rico have no such right. The States elect two Senators and a number of Representatives, according to their population. Porto Rico elects a Commissioner who sits in the House of Representatives without the right to vote, while his right to the floor depends on the consent of the House.

It is true that Porto Rico disposes of its customhouse and internal revenue receipts, while the States do not. But, surely, no State is willing to change places with Porto Rico and to surrender its internal sovereignty for the sake of receiving all the taxes derived from incomes and excises.

The power to legislate on local matters, aside from taxation, is not superior to that of the States.

In this connection it should be remembered that Congress has the right to nullify all legislation enacted by our local legislature. Let us acknowledge, in honor of Congress and of Porto Pico, too, that not a single law has ever been nullified by congressional action in all our history of association with the United States.

PORTO RICAN FINANCES

"Without admitting the existence of 'a grave economical situation' in the finances of the government of Porto Rico, the present difficulty, which it is hoped is but temporary, is exclusively the result of the exercise by the elected representatives of the people of Porto Rico of an authority granted by the present very liberal organic law. The responsibility of the United States, as distinguished from that of Porto Rico, is, at most, that officers appointed by the President in Porto Rico may not have exercised power legally placed in their hands to veto or make ineffective acts of the Porto Rican Legislature." (The President.)

"The present difficulty in the finances of the government of Porto Rico," we agree, "is but temporary," though it is not "the result of the exercise by the elected representatives of the people of Porto Rico of an authority granted by the present very liberal organic act."

The representatives elected by the people have always provided ample sources of revenue to meet the appropriations made by them. In the year 1925 the legislature enacted a new income tax law drafted by an expert of national standing, Doctor Haig, upon the general lines of the Federal statute. The normal rate of the tax on property was left at 1 per cent, as in 1902, and all the proceeds from this source were devoted, as prior to the former date, to the needs of the several municipalities, the insular government retaining but 10 or 20 per cent, according to the means of the several local governments. This retention was made to compensate the insular government for the expense of imposing and collecting the tax. The increase in the rate of the property tax was entirely due to certain mill taxes levied by the insular government and the several municipalities to provide sinking funds with which to meet the principal of, and interest on, bond issues sold for the purpose of improving sanitary conditions, building schools, constructing roads, and carrying out other improvements necessary to satisfy public needs, thus providing work for the laborers, especially during those seasons of the year when they are unable to obtain work on the sugar, tobacco, and coffee plantations.

A new tax of 4 cents a hundredweight was levied on the manufacture of sugar, and a sales tax of 2 per cent was levied on all commodities except food staples and articles subject to excise taxes. Business licenses and excise taxes practically remained the same, though the rate was reduced on many articles of American manufacture. All these measures were necessary in order to meet the floating debt contracted during the recess of the legislature from August 23, 1923, to February 9, 1925. In accordance with the provisions of the organic act in force at the time, which provided for biennial sessions, the legislature approved the general budget for the fiscal years 1923–24 and 1924–25, before it adjourned in August, 1923. Pursuant to the estimates of the financial officers of the government, that legislature provided ample sources of revenue to meet appropriations, but a coordinate effort on the part of many taxpayers to resist the payment of taxes, and the inconsiderate granting of writs of injunction by the then judge of the Federal court, preventing the treasurer from levying and collecting taxes—particularly excise taxes, which form the principal source of government revenue—brought about a condition that was met by our governor in the only possible way—by not allowing the machinery of the government to come to a standstill. To this end he borrowed from the National City Bank and from the proceeds of the public-improvement bond issue such sums of money as had been diverted from the treasury by the above-mentioned writs of injunction. The same concerted efforts of a number of taxpayers were repeated after the legislature adjourned in 1925, a fruitless attack having been made on the sales tax act, since the same was upheld by both the Federal court under its new judge and the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit.

The amount involved in the injunction proceedings against the treasurer was $5,610,747.91. The amount of the floating debt was $5,025,000, of which $2,822,574.56 have been repaid out of the surpluses of the ordinary revenues of the island. Between now and June 30 of this year we will pay an additional $702,425.42, thus leaving a debt of $1,500,000 to be paid from the same source in another year and one-half at the rate of $1,000,000 a year. The Government has been successful as a rule in sustaining the legality of the several taxes; but thousands, perhaps millions, of dollars of taxes neither levied nor collected on account of the injunctions, have been lost beyond any possibility of recovery by the insular treasury.

After the enactment of the present organic act (Mar. 2, 1917), the native-born treasurers of Porto Rico have encountered difficulties with which their continental predecessors were not confronted. In the first place, by the said organic act the congress established in Porto Rico the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and although, acting in a democratic manner, it provided that such prohibition could be repealed by a referendum of the Porto Rican voters, the latter, by a great majority, decided to uphold it, as they thought it was their duty to maintain the intent of Congress and to harmonize their opinion with national opinion, which at that time was so much in favor of prohibition that shortly thereafter the eighteenth amendment in force in Porto Rico was ratified.

From a financial standpoint prohibition meant to the treasury the loss of about $1,192,909.04, which was the amount of revenue under the corresponding item during the fiscal year 1916–17.

In the second place, since the approval of the Hollander bill in 1902, excise taxes were imposed upon merchandise manufactured and imported into Porto Rico and were collected without difficulty at the time of importation and before the merchandise was delivered to the consignees; but after 1917 the question of the legality of the imposition of said taxes on merchandise in its original packages was raised, it being alleged that such imposition was contrary to the provisions governing interstate commerce and that it constituted a duty on imports. This naturally brought about instances of avoidance of payment of the tax, and after protracted and costly controversies in the courts and the loss of considerable revenue by the Treasury, Congress recognized the necessity of granting to Porto Rico the right to collect the internal revenue taxes provided by our local laws at the time of importation, and approved the act of March 4, 1927.

This enactment put an end to the controversy, but we are of the opinion that the cooperation of the customs and postal authorities ought to be more effective than at present. This would be accomplished by providing that the excises be collected by the said officials and that postal packages, or those coming by express or through any other channel, shall not be delivered to the consignees until after payment of the tax.

In the third place, the reduction by the internal revenue laws of the United States of the rate of the excise tax on tobacco brought about a remarkable decrease in the revenue derived from the importation of Porto Rican tobacco into the United States, which revenue, by virtue of the organic act, is paid back to Porto Rico.

And, finally, the income derived from customs receipts diminishes in proportion to the reduction of importations from foreign countries and to the increase of importations from the continental United States, which at present represent 90 per cent of our entire commerce, as may be seen from the following statement:

Imports

1900:
From United States	$6,952,124
From foreign countries	3,201,922
Total	10,214,036
1927:
From United States	87,046,319
From foreign countries	11,764,431
Total	98,810,750

The customs duties in 1927 amounted to $1,806,567.91, or only about 16.14 per cent of our public revenues.

It is fair to say that no responsibility can be placed on the governor for not exercising the veto power, because in dealing with the budget he has always freely used the extraordinary power granted to the executive under the present very liberal organic act, by simply striking out any appropriation which in his judgment should be eliminated. Furthermore, he has exercised the very questionable power of amending appropriations by reducing them, in order to readjust the total amount of the budget to a too conservative estimate of probable receipts, the idea being to obtain surpluses applicable to the repayment of the floating debt. He has used this power without restriction and more freely than any former chief executive of the island. Neither is the legislature at fault, for the budget for said fiscal years was reasonable and was justified by the estimates of receipts. The deficit was the direct and immediate result of hampering the treasury by means of injunctions against the levying and collection of taxes. That fact was recognized in the annual report of the governor to the President and the Congress, as can be readily ascertained by reading from such report for the year 1925. (See Exhibit II.)

And if further proof were needed to support the contention that our past financial difficulties were due entirely to the concerted movement on the part of certain capitalistic interests to embarrass our government, and not to careless or unwise legislation on the part of our people, we wish to recall the action recently taken by Congress and the President in approving a law on March 4, 1927, amending our organic act, whereby—

"No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax imposed by the laws of Porto Rico shall be maintained in the District Court of the United States for Porto Rico."

This generous and timely action on the part of both Congress and the President was prompted by their desire to rescue us from the greedy hands of a group of taxpayers, after becoming convinced that our improvidence was not the cause of our past difficulties.

THE PAN AMERICAN CONFERENCE

"The cablegram complains," continues the President, "that 'ours is the only Spanish-American country whose voice has not been heard at Habana during the Pan American conference, for it was not represented there.'

"This is a most serious error and is based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the relation of Porto Rico to the United States. No State or Territory of the Union was represented as such at Habana, but the representation of the United States in Habana represents Porto Rico as truly as it represents any part of the territory of the United States."

We do not misunderstand the relation of Porto Rico to the United States. We know that we are not foreign to the United States, but neither are we an integral part thereof in a constitutional sense. In a word, we know that we are "appurtenant to," a possession of, the Republic. (See Insular Cases and Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U. S. 298; 66 L. ed. 627.)

We know that in any international gathering the United States delegates represent the Union, including all the local subdivisions of the federation, without excluding the Territories and possessions. But we had in mind the words of the late President, elected on the same ballot on which President Coolidge was elected Vice President, when he said, on the solemn occasion of the unveiling of the statue of the liberator, Simon Bolivar, at Central Park:

"Porto Rico is a part of our own territory under a permanent policy aimed at its prosperity and progress, and we see in our Latin American State the best agency to aid the Americas to understand each other."

We assume that said words, pronounced on that occasion before the representatives of all the Latin American Republics, have some meaning; and we had the notion, possibly an erroneous one, that we might have been of some use to the country of our adoption and to those of our own race and blood, provided we had had a voice, if not a vote, at the gathering in Habana, where the peoples bound to us by history sat with the United States to discuss the problems of this hemisphere—a gathering that sat at the capital city of Cuba, our closest sister, whose historical vicissitudes, civilization, and ideology are identical with ours, except that the Cubans shed their blood in Cuba, while Porto Ricans, unable to fight in their country, also shed their blood in Cuba for the freedom of our sister island and for our own. We had in mind that the English colonies—Canada, Newfoundland, the South African Confederation, Australia, New Zealand, and the Irish Free State—are represented and have a voice and a vote with Great Britain and Scotland in the League of Nations and that certainly there is nothing obnoxious to English sovereignty in that plan. On the contrary, the extraordinary result of England's manner of dealing with her so-called colonies which are veritable commonwealths and integral units of the British Empire (or, as the Prime Minister of Australia calls it, the commonwealth of British nations) is the welding together in one community, as in Canada, of peoples of Saxon and of Latin origin, of different races, religions, and traditions, and the union of vast territories and different nationalities situated at the four corners of the earth, all devoted to one common purpose.

But we must say that in our cablegram we did not claim participation in the Pan American conference. We point out the fact that Cuba, emancipated from Spain by force of arms, acknowledged as an independent nation by the United States after a period of intervention in her internal affairs, and with a standard of civilization certainly not superior to that of Porto Rico, was the hostess of all the peoples of the Western Hemisphere, except Porto Rico, all of said peoples being of our own origin and language. And when the President so nobly and so wisely said at the conference—

"We are thoroughly committed to the principle that they are better fitted to govern themselves than anyone else is to govern them. We do not claim immediate perfection. But we do expect continual progress. Our history reveals that in such expectation we have not been disappointed. It is better for people to make their own mistakes than to have some one else make their mistakes for them"— we felt that for the very reason that we had no voice at the conference, since the United States spoke for us at the Pan American gathering, we were justified in indorsing the words of the President to our sister countries of Latin America and in asking their indorsement in our behalf.

Perhaps we did not observe established precedents of diplomacy; but we might say in atonement of our attitude that ours is also a case without precedent and that diplomacy is made for peoples enjoying their own sovereignty to the fullest degree. We were trying by all means to submit our plea for absolute self-government to the American people and to Congress by presenting to them the contrast between Cuban independence, acknowledged and protected by the United States, and the case of Porto Rico, which is on the same level, at least, as Cuba, but under a political régime according to which not all the powers of the government are derived from the will of the people. And it is not that we are opposed to American sovereignty, to the jurisdiction of the United States. It is not that we want to ignore the benefits of our association with the United States or that we are disloyal to our American citizenship. On the contrary, we are exercising the rights pertaining to that citizenship by asking redress for a condition of political inferiority and by asking for all the rights of citizenship enjoyed by the States and not by us, except the privilege of electing senators and representatives, for we apprehend that our continental brothers might object to the interference in purely national affairs of representatives from a country outside the continent, the race, history, language, and traditions of which country are different from those of the continental States—a country like ours, whose density of population and lack of inducement to extensive colonization render it impervious to penetration by the people from the mainland.

PROMISES OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

"The treaty of Paris, of course, contains no promise to the people of Porto Rico. No phase of that treaty contemplated the extension to Porto Rico of a more liberal régime than existed. The United States has made no promise to the people of Porto Rico that has not been more than fulfilled, nor has any representative or spokesman for the United States made such a promise." (The President's letter.)

The treaty of Paris, dated April 11, 1899, contains but the following provision:

"The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress." (Article IX.)

As an explanation of this article, the American commissioners, in their memorandum of December 9, 1898, held that as regards the political status and civil rights of the native inhabitants, these were reserved to Congress which would enact laws for the government of the territories ceded to the United States, this being but a confirmation of the right of the sovereign power to leave to the new government the establishment of these important relations. The Congress of a nation which never enacted a law oppressive or detrimental to the rights of residents within its dominions and whose laws guarantee the greatest liberty compatible with the conservation of property, surely can be trusted not to depart from its well-established practice in dealing with the inhabitants of these islands.

The commander in chief of the United States army of occupation, Gen. Nelson A. Miles, in his proclamation to the inhabitants of Porto Rico, dated July 28, 1898, said:

"In the prosecution of the war against the Kingdom of Spain by the people of the United States in the cause of liberty, justice, and humanity its military forces have come to occupy the Island of Porto Rico They come bearing the banner of freedom, inspired by a noble purpose to seek the enemies of our country and yours, and to destroy or capture all who are in armed resistence. They bring you the fostering arm of a nation of free people, whose greatest power is in justice and humanity to all those living within its fold. * * * We have not come to make war upon the people of a country that for centuries has been oppressed, but, on the contrary, to bring you protection, not only to yourselves but to your property, to promote your prosperity, and to bestow upon you the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government."

Secretary of War John W. Weeks, in charge of the affairs of Porto Rico and thoroughly acquainted with the conditions of the island, wrote to Governor Towner in the year 1924, as follows:

"This bill, S. 2448, as it passed the Senate, embodied the views of the department, except that the department favored the election of a governor not earlier than 1932, feeling that the intervening period might be used to good advantage by the people of Porto Rico in preparation for this advance in autonomy.

"The views here have not changed, and I can not but feel that the preparatory work which you have undertaken in preparing the legislative mind for this amendment has been accomplished and that in due course the act will pass, certainly sooner than it could pass if its main feature became effective now."

President Coolidge himself indorsed the views of the Secretary of War in another letter to our Resident Commissioner, Mr. CÓRDOVA DÁVILA, that reads as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 5, 1924.

MY DEAR JUDGE CÓRDOVA: Secretary Weeks has shown me his letter to the acting chairman of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, expressing his approval, with certain slight modifications, of the bill authorizing the election by the people of Porto Rico of their governor in 1932 and thereafter.

The position of Secretary Weeks on this question has my cordial approval.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) CALVIN COOLIDGE.

In 1925 the United States Senate unanimously passed a bill, favorably reported by its Committee on Territories, granting to Porto Rico, beginning with the election of 1932, the right to elect its governor by popular vote. Said official's term of office was to be four years, and he was subject to removal by the President before the expiration of such term. The bill also gave the governor power to designate his cabinet, including the attorney general and the commissioner of education who are at present appointed by the President. The Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives reported the bill favorably, but it was impossible to consider it on the floor of the House on account of the great accumulation of work in the last days of the session.

Four years have elapsed and the bill has not become law nor been discussed, although it has been again introduced by Senator KING, of Utah, and by Congressman LAGUARDIA, of New York, and the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico, Hon. FÉLIX CÓRDOVA DÁVILA.

Now, then, if these are not promises of full and complete self-government we declare that we know not what constitutes a promise. Moreover, the promise of self-government to a strange people offered shelter in the home of American democracy is implied in the Constitution, in the institutions of said democracy, and in the history of its territorial expansion, which shows 35 incipient communities converted into sovereign and free Commonwealths absolutely ruling their own destinies.

RIGHTS INHERENT IN CITIZENSHIP

"The people of Porto Rico are citizens of the United States, with all the rights and privileges of other citizens of the United States, and these privileges are those which we invoked when declaring for independence at the memorable convention at Philadelphia." (The President.)

Certainly we "are citizens of the United States." We have "all the rights and privileges of other citizens of the United States." As regards individual or inalienable rights of citizens, we fully enjoy the same; but what of the political rights? The Constitution guarantees to each State a republican form of government. Our form of government is only partly republican. The executive is not elected. He is appointed by the President; and, besides, he is vested with extraordinary veto powers unknown in State constitutions. We do not participate in the election of the President or the Vice President or of the Senators and Representatives in Congress. Our constitution is subject to change by Congress. Unquestionably these are the very privileges that were invoked by Continental Americans "when declaring for independence at the memorable convention at Philadelphia."

PORTO RICO PAST AND PRESENT

The President says:

"In answering the cablegram, it might be well to consider briefly the conditions and tendencies we found in Porto Rico and what the situation in Porto Rico is to-day, as well as the steps we are responsible for in Porto Rico to better conditions as we found them and as they exist to-day.

"There is no conflict of opinion as to the condition in which we found Porto Rico. Perhaps the best authority on local conditions was Dr. Cayetano Coll y Toste, who in an article published in Porto Rico in 1897, after describing the progress in Porto Rico for 100 years ending with that year, has described the great body of the population of Porto Rico."

Let us say at the beginning that there is a mistake in connection with the date of Doctor Coll y Toste's article. It was written not in 1897 but in 1892. We must add that the dark picture drawn by Doctor Coll was greatly exaggerated, since the document was intended as an arraignment of the Spanish Government in Porto Rico. Doctor Coll, unable to find the root of the evil, exclaimed:

"No; it is not possible that the Tropical Zone produces such organic anemia. This lethargy of body and soul is the offspring of moral and physical vices that drag down the spirit of our peasants and lead them to such state of social degradation."

But time is an unbiased and unchallenged judge, and after many years two scientific men of international renown—one of them an American Army surgeon—Doctors Ashford and Gutiérrez, answered the question raised by Doctor Coll y Toste, not by guessing, not in a theoretical way, but on the basis of scientific tests and methods which vindicated the Porto Rican peasant, the jibaro, from the stigma of vice and moral degradation.

We quote from Social Problems in Porto Rico, by Fred K. Fleagle, dean University of Porto Rico, D. C. Heath & Co., publishers, pages 79 and 80. (See Exhibit III.)

The Legislature of Porto Rico has been giving the utmost consideration to this vital problem, and large sums have been devoted to the eradication of uncinariasis. In the year 1925, $200,000 was transferred from a bond issue appropriation to the aforesaid undertaking, in addition to the sum of $50,000 appropriated in the budget for each of the fiscal years 1925–26 and 1926–27. We are glad to acknowledge the cooperation of the Rockefeller Institute with the insular department of sanitation in this important field. The efforts for the control of this tropical disease have been centuplicated since the year 1917, when the people of Porto Rico took full control of the legislature. The same applies to all branches of governmental activities—education, road construction, waterworks, sewers, tarring of roads to prevent dust and rapid deterioration under tropical conditions, erection of public schools and other buildings, development of agriculture, improvement of labor conditions, etc.

Permit us to say that the conditions prevailing in the mountain regions of Porto Rico exist also in some sections of the United States. We quote further from the same work of Doctor Fleagle, who in turn quotes Doctors Gutiérrez and Ashford (p. 29):

"We strongly feel that these writers have unconsciously described uncinariasis. Are the Spanish people considered lazy by those who know them? Were those Spaniards who conquered Mexico, Peru, and all South America, who formed so formidable a power in the Middle Ages, a lazy people?

"Is it laziness or disease that is this very day attracting the attention of the United States to the descendant of the pure-blooded English stock in the southern Appalachian Range, in the mountains of Carolina and Tennessee, the section of our country where the greatest predominance of pure American blood occurs, despised by the negro who calls him 'poor white trash.'"

Doctor Coll's mentioned article describing the progress of Porto Rico in 100 years shows that such progress was steady and continuous. Porto Rico was a country chiefly composed of small farmers; the balance of our external commerce was in favor of the island; the cost of living was much lower than at present; the laborers had the opportunity to cultivate small parcels of land for their own benefit, and absentee owners were unknown. And the fact is of great significance that in 1897, the year before American occupation, the island had entered a new era of freedom by reason of the grant of a complete self-government which placed the destinies of the country wholly in the hands of Porto Ricans. Who can venture to prophesy that under said régime of political and economic freedom the progress of Porto Rico in all phases of human endeavor would not have been as great as that which we have attained under American rule? We venture to say that perhaps we would have gone more slowly; but in every probability we would have reached all social classes and not have benefited a chosen few, as now happens, with the result that the difference between millionaires and laborers, the latter almost destitute of the very essentials of life, is more striking.

On the question of absentee landlords Doctor Fleagle, quoting Weyl, says (p. 17):

"Many of the absentee owners of Porto Rican properties and many of their agents in Porto Rico consider the island and its population as equally fit for the crassest exploitation, and are as contemptuous of the people as they are enthusiastic about the island. The current use by many Americans of an opprobrious epithet for Porto Ricans bespeaks an attitude which takes no account of the human phase of the problem, but considers the population as composed merely of so many laborers willing to work for such-and-such a price."

And on pages 71, 72, and 73 Doctor Fleagle says on the economic condition of the island: (See Exhibit IV.)

As shown by Dr. Cayetano Coll y Toste in his Reseña Histórica de Puerto Rico, published in 1899, the population of this country in 1897 was 894,302. The agricultural wealth consisted of 2,090,221 acres of cultivated land, valued at $48,694,584, and distributed among 60,953 estates. At the time the land was planted as follows: 61,556 acres to sugar cane; 4,267 to tobacco; 122,358 to coffee; 1,127,086 to pasture; 93,508 to minor products; 17,176 to other diverse products, and 664,270 were in woodland and underbrush.

The cattle wealth consisted of 395,792 head, of which 303,612 were bovine, and in all they were worth $8,366,515. Our urban wealth amounted to $28,867,928.79.

In the year 1927 there were over 240,000 acres of the best land devoted to the cultivation of sugar cane, and 85,000 to the cultivation of tobacco. These two examples are sufficient to show in figures the tangible actuality that Porto Rico devotes its efforts to supply the demands of the American market, to the detriment of its local demands.

Now, what has become of the 60,953 rural estates which in 1897 furnished a means of livelihood to 894,302 inhabitants? The census of 1920 gives us an idea of the situation. At that time the number of estates had been reduced to 41,078, while the population, which must necessarily make a living from agriculture as the principal source of wealth, had increased to 1,299,809. At present the number of estates is about 30,000.

To give a specific proof of the concentration of wealth, we will take six municipalities of the sugar-producing regions and compare the number of estates existing in them in 1897 and in 1920:

	Estates
	1897	1920
Arroyo	319	113
Santa Isabel	141	36
Guayama	642	388
Fajardo	507	250
Salinas	227	116
Yauco (including Guánica)	2,001	987

With respect to the morals of our people, Doctor Fleagle says (pp. 29, 34) (see Exhibit V):

SUFFRAGE BEFORE AND AFTER AMERICAN OCCUPATION

"Prior to the American occupation, the Porto Rican people had received practically no training in self-government or the free exercise of the franchise. While there existed a body of educated, intelligent men, the great mass of the people were without experience or training in self-government and only a small percentage could qualify as voters under very broad electoral qualifications." (The President's letter.)

We will answer this by saying that at the time of the American occupation we enjoyed universal suffrage granted to us in the year 1897; that under the law the total membership of the lower house of parliament and a majority of the upper house were elected by the voters; that as far back as 1812 we elected representatives to the Spanish constitutional assembly at Cadiz, a Porto Rican, Don Ramon Power, having been elected as one of the vice presidents of that historical gathering; that we participated in all the events of Spanish constitutional history; that in the year 1867 we sent our representatives to inform the Spanish Government on the momentous question of the abolition of slavery, our men, slave owners themselves, having urged the government of the metropolis to abolish slavery immediately, with or without indemnity, and with or without regulation of labor; that by the suffrage of our people we elected 17 representatives to the Cortes of 1872 and 12 to the national assembly of 1873, all of whom asked for the abolition of slavery, said petition, thanks to the powerful and illustrious orator and statesman, Emilio Castelar, having been granted March 22, 1873, without bloodshed or disturbance of any kind.

In short, at the time of the American occupation our senators and representatives, elected by our people, were sitting in the two houses of the Spanish parliament; we had elected the municipal assemblies of our 72 cities and towns, the provincial assembly (diputacion provincial), and the two houses of our own parliament, the entire membership of the lower one and the majority of the upper house being elective.

We shall not deny the achievements of the military government. On the whole it was a credit to the nation, except that the third military governor gave the coup de grace to the autonomic government by abolishing the cabinet system by means of a general order that provoked the resignation of the Prime Minister, Luis Muñoz Rivera, the leader of the Federal Party and of Porto Rico, together with his entire cabinet.

THE PRESENT STATUS OF PORTO RICO

It is true that the fiscal provisions now governing Porto Rico are far more liberal than those of any State or Territory. No State or Territory has ever been allowed to retain customs duties or to have its own system of internal revenue laws for its own purposes. But it is also true that conditions in no Territory were ever the same as in Porto Rico.

What was the population of the several Territories, and what was the value of property therein when they were admitted to statehood?

"Of the 25 States admitted to the Union, beginning with Vermont in 1791 and closing with Colorado in 1876, Maine and Kansas alone had as much as 100,000 population. Vermont, Kentucky, Missouri, and California are the only others which had as many as 50,000 population. In 1836–37 Arkansas * * * was admitted with 25,000 and Michigan with 31,000. From 1845 to 1848 * * * Florida, Iowa, and Wisconsin were admitted to the Union—Florida with a population of 28,700, Iowa with 43,000, and Wisconsin with 30,900.

"Again, in 1858 * * * Minnesota was admitted on the previous census * * * showing a population only of 7,000 inhabitants, and the next year Oregon became a State with only 13,200 population.

"In 1867 * * * Nebraska was taken in on a population of 28,800, and in 1876 * * * Colorado came in with only 39,000."

(Statement of Marcus A. Smith, Delegate from the Territory of Arizona, at the hearing held by the Senate Committee on Territories, June 28 and 30, 1902, on House bill No. 12543, "providing for the admission of the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma to statehood," p. 322.)

"When Arkansas was admitted they had $19,000,000 of taxable property; Alabama had $24,000,000; Missouri, $22,000,000; Florida, $21,000,000; Iowa, $24,000,000; California, $22,000,000, Oregon, $29,000,000; Kansas, $35,000,000; Nevada, $30,000,000; Idaho, $26,000,000; and Wyoming, $23,000,000." (Statement of Mr. Flynn, Delegate to Congress for Oklahoma, same document, p. 384.)

Let us compare Porto Rico with the three last Territories admitted to statehood and with the Hawaiian Territory. (See Exhibit VI.)

The statistics contained in Exhibit VI explain why Congress granted to Porto Rico, with a population of 1,398,796 and a density of 407.22 inhabitants per square mile, such generous treatment as it has never afforded a Territory. The public domain in the Territories was very large; agricultural lands were extensive and rich; natural resources plenty and undeveloped; population scarce and scattered over large areas; there was no foreign commerce; little business from which to derive license and excise taxes; no income tax; and a small school population.

The value of the lands granted to said Territories as an endowment from the Federal Government upon their admission to statehood greatly exceeded the value of the resources granted to us by Congress wherewith to meet the needs and solve the problems of Porto Rico, one of the most densely populated countries on earth. No doubt Congress is and has been generous to Porto Rico from the financial standpoint. The United States took Porto Rico as a ward. They adopted us and assumed before the world the duty of promoting our welfare. That could be done in one of two ways: Either by appropriating money to carry on the governmental activities of the island, or by granting us all revenues derived from sources in Porto Rico. Congress followed the latter course, and very wisely, too. Porto Rico claims that she has used such resources in the best possible way to benefit our island; and the progress of our people, as acknowledged by the Chief Executive of the Nation and by all the governors appointed by him and his predecessors, is the best evidence of our capacity for self-government that we can offer to our fellow citizens of the States and to the world.

Coming to other differences between Porto Rico and the organized and incorporated Territories, these differences are:

First. In all the Territories except Hawaii and Alaska there has always been an express promise of statehood. That promise was contained in the ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory.

The same provision was contained in the treaties with France for the purchase of the vast expanse of French Louisiana, in the treaty with Spain for the acquisition of Florida, and in the Guadalupe-Hidalgo treaty with Mexico.

Second. The governors of the Territories, according to long-honored tradition, have always been bona fide residents of such Territories.

Third. The veto power of the governors of the Territories can be overrode by a two-thirds vote of both houses.

TARIFF

"The United States tariff extends to Porto Rico, and no part—certainly no agricultural part—of our territory is so favored by its tariff. And the striking development of Porto Rico under American sovereignty as shown by the growth of imports and exports is, in a material part, due to this favorable tariff treatment of its products." (The President.)

In dealing with the benefits derived from the national tariff it is well to remember the basis of the diet of our laboring classes.

Doctor Fleagle quotes Doctors Gutiérrez and Ashford on pages 8 and 9 of Social Problems of Porto Rico, as may be seen in Exhibit VII.

Now, let us consider how the tariff affects our people. On rice, for example, the duty is 2 cents a pound. We imported in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, from the United States 174,479,054 pounds, worth $8,149,443.

The 2-cent duty represents a burden on the poor man's breakfast of $3,489,581.08. The same applies to wheat flour, codfish, beans, pork, lard, corn, and other articles of extensive and general consumption, and to wearing apparel.

Of course, we accept that in just reciprocity we are bound to buy American goods at the domestic price; and we do not complain of our inability to buy similar goods manufactured in foreign countries except at prohibitive prices, because, when the United States protects the beet sugar of the Western States, Louisiana sugar, and the Kentucky, Virginia, and the Carolina tobaccos, they also protect our sugar and tobacco, by allowing importation free of duty into continental United States. But it is not fair, in our judgment, to make the Porto Rican "poor man's breakfast" pay tribute to growers in the States, especially when the cheap coffee from Brazil is allowed to compete, free of duty, with our superior bean in order not to burden the American "poor man's breakfast." The result has been an enormous decrease in the production of coffee, which was once our main crop. If we are now selling our coffee at a profitable price it is because of the so-called Brazilian valorization of coffee. But now that we receive high prices for our product we have almost none to sell; and what is worse, foreign coffee is invading our island, free of duty, to compete with the native berry in the local market as Porto Rican coffee. So it is clear that the tariff operates both ways. It increases the production of sugar and tobacco—two-thirds of which are in the hands of continental Americans who have monopolized almost all our best lands—and decreases the production of coffee owned chiefly by Porto Ricans.

In 1897 our simple life depended upon the agricultural production of goods which were mostly of home consumption, and this agriculture offered the people opportunity for work throughout the year and the satisfaction of their needs at a price consistent with the wages then paid. Our agricultural revolution, as a result of the concentration of wealth, has developed a market inaccessible to the laborer, and a great reduction in the opportunity for work, for the reason that most of the agricultural activities are such that they do not offer the farm laborer steady work. Therefore, not only is our present-day laborer in a worse plight than the laborer of 1897 because the purchasing power of his wages is less than it was then, but also because he can not obtain work for more than five or six months each year, if at all.

In our opinion, the hardest financial problem with which the people of Porto Rico are confronted is that of unemployment. Indeed, unemployment affects the Porto Rican home directly, and commerce, the small industries, and even our most insignificant social activities, indirectly.

A specific instance of this situation, under which the domestic market is inaccessible to the laborer, may be given by taking milk as an example, and we may say in passing that in accordance with the records of the department of agriculture and labor the production of milk in Porto Rico does not amount to one tablespoonful per capita, while we are forced to import nearly $1,500,000 worth of condensed milk a year from the United States. With the 37-cent wages of 1897 the laborer could buy 20 quarts of milk; with the 80-cent wages of 1927, he could buy but 5 quarts in the country districts and only 4 in San Juan. Thus, for this purpose, the 37 cents of 1897 were worth four times as much as the 80 cents of 1927.

Tests might be made regarding different articles of prime necessity and it would not be difficult to reach the conclusion that on the average, taking into account the respective markets, the wages of 1897 were much higher than those of 1927. If we add to this the fact that there were more opportunities, less population, and greater stability it is necessary to admit, from the viewpoint of social welfare, that our financial situation, as to those matters that most closely bear on the life of the people, was much better at the time to which the President refers than at this time of progress for a few and of want for the many.

ALLEGED LACK OF PREPARATION OF OUR PEOPLE

"Certainly, giving Porto Rico greater liberty than it has ever enjoyed and power of government for the exercise of which its people are barely prepared can not be said with propriety to be establishing therein a mere subjected colony." (The President.)

It is our impression that the words are hardly consistent with these others from the same pen:

"Congress, recognizing the progress in Porto Rico, enacted in 1917 the present organic act."

* * * * * * *

"We have now in Porto Rico a government in which the participation by Americans from the United States is indeed small."

* * * * * * *

"It is not our desire to leave the impression that all progress in Porto Rico is due to continental Americans. Without the cooperation and assistance of Porto Ricans progress would have been indeed negligible."

* * * * * * *

"There exists to-day in Porto Rico a department of health in all respects modern and including in its activities all branches of modern public-health work. Not of least importance as showing the marked progress in health matters in Porto Rico in recent years is the fact that it is completely manned by Porto Ricans."

* * * * * * *

"The island has so improved and its people have so progressed in the last generation as to justify high hopes for the future."

The achievements of our people in all branches of the public administration and the lofty spirit of the whole body of laws enacted by the legislative assembly during the 28 years of its existence have been acknowledged by all our governors representing the President here, and by every impartial visitor who observes our institutions and systems of learning, sanitation, agriculture, and public works without bias and selfish prejudices. Our laws can stand comparison with the statutes enacted by the most progressive States; and Porto Rican leadership in all governmental activities is acknowledged by witnesses of such high standing that we may well be allowed to take pride in our success notwithstanding bitter criticisms from many quarters.

From the report of Dr. William Crocker, chairman committee of biology and agriculture, National Research Council, Washington, D. C., year 1927, we copy:

"Already Porto Rico is furnishing a number of trained agriculturists to other Latin American countries. She is also looked to for advice in this field. A graduate school of agriculture would strengthen and render very effective this leadership. What is true of Porto Rico in regard to agricultural advance is true in other fields, such as elementary, secondary, and higher education; development of medicine and sanitation; the operation of reform and penal institutions and asylums for the insane. The building, organization, and operation of the last three sorts of institutions is as good as the best in the States. In short, Porto Rico is in position to assume leadership in most lines of advancement in tropical America.

"Perhaps the most important single point to be considered in the formation of such a school is the quality of young men to be educated. On this one can feel the greatest assurance. In the present vigorous campaign of development of public institutions and public works in Porto Rico—a development that has characterized Governor Towner's excellent administration—young well-trained Porto Ricans are largely heading the several phases of activity and they are handling the work is a through-going up-to-date way and with an enthusiasm and patriotism that is assuring. If other countries of tropical America can furnish as good young men and as large a percentage of them as Porto Rico can, there will be an abundance of able and earnest young men to be trained.

"I believe it is generally agreed that the people of Latin America and the people of the United States fail in large measure to understand each other and therefore to cooperate in their efforts for advancement. This is easily understood when one realizes that they are of very different temperament and have different languages, cultures, and religions. Porto Rico, on the other hand, is bilingual and has gone far toward blending both types of culture."

From the address delivered by Dr. Frederick S. Woodbridge, dean of the graduate faculty of political science, Columbia University, at the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the University of Porto Rico, March 15, 1928, we cite the following:

"Here in this little island the changes and chances of this mortal life have brought two great civilizations together. I found here expressed in what I saw and heard, not simply the hope but the eager effort that the meeting of these two civilizations should not end in discord but in harmony, that the rich heritage of neither should be lost but should be utilized to make this island an illustration of the conquest of nature adorned by the fruits of the spirit. That is a very great ambition. But it is like islands to be ambitious. They like to point out to continents the latter's proper business. They can make themselves reminders of things too easily forgotten when sheer magnitude lies heavy on the mind. They see the prospect from their own door.

"What does this island see? Itself, of course; its own troubles and worries; but it sees also continental America, North and South, and knows that their troubles and worries, especially as they face each other, are like its own. But here these troubles and worries are a matter of daily concern. Here they are not left for occasional conference and adjustment. They make up the ever-present problem of the people of Porto Rico. Who can doubt that this island and this university are right in thinking that their handling of this problem is of unique significance? Who can fail to rejoice that they see it clearly? These 25 years have been rich in achievement. They are richer still in promise. Size has nothing to do with the matter. A model, however small, is a model of what can be done in the large. The universities in whose behalf I have the honor to respond greet this university with affection and esteem. They pray for its increased prosperity. It is an island lighthouse, the light of which makes clear to those who sail the often stormy seas of human affairs a safe course which leads to the heaven of good will."

Dr. R. B. Hill, of the International Health Board, says in an article entitled "Public health progress in Porto Rico," published in the American Journal of Tropical Medicine for May, 1925:

"Public-health work may be said to have begun in 1918, when the department of health determined to initiate a systematic campaign against uncinariasis, then as now the most important and pressing problem confronting it. Upon invitation, the International Health Board of the Rockefeller Foundation made a hookworm survey, which disclosed the fact that 90 per cent of the rural population of the island, or almost 1,000,000 people, were suffering from the disease. A plan for cooperative work was outlined in which sanitation was to precede curative measures."

And Doctor Sellards, in an article entitled "Bonds of union between tropical medicine and general medicine," published in Science, July 29, 1927, writes thus:

"Recently I have had the pleasure of visiting the department of health and the privilege of seeing something of the work of your director of public health. The achievements in hygiene in Porto Rico are progressing to such an extent that the workers in this institute will be driven not merely to the neighboring islands but farther and farther from these shores on expeditions for research in its many and varied phases."

The School of Tropical Medicine was due to Porto Rican initiative. It is evidence of the fact that we Porto Ricans progress and take advantage of our association with the United States.

Illiteracy has been claimed to be a barrier to the admission of our people to complete self-government. We have decreased our illiteracy from 80 per cent to 40 per cent.

Let us hear the words of the Hon. Horace M. Towner, our upright and worthy governor, as contained in his last report to the President, covering the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927:

"Illiteracy: As a result of the special campaign against illiteracy 2,484 adults were taught to read and write during the last school year. The people and the teaching force of the department worked together with a spirit of cooperation and self-sacrifice which deserves recognition and praise. Each town where the work was begun adopted its own plan and selected a board or boards to put it into execution. Forty-two municipalities have so far organized to carry on the work. Night schools were opened in both the urban and rural zones, enrolling altogether 4,269 pupils. Money was secured and the teachers taught in the night schools, sometimes without charge and sometimes for wages ranging from $10 to $25 per month. The number of those who worked gratuitously exceeded the number of those who were paid. In some districts the teachers were requested to teach one, two, or as many as five illiterates. In one district 264 illiterates learned to read and write from the personal instruction of 32 teachers. In one instance a municipality paid the entire expense of one school; in another, two; in another, the mayor paid one teacher. Donations from private persons were numerous. The parents' association, the Red Cross, and other associations rendered valuable aid.

"In two municipalities the high-school students opened, taught, and supported night schools for illiterates.

"Illiteracy has been reduced in Porto Rico during about a quarter of a century from a percentage of 83 to below 40 at the present time. With this work continued among adult illiterates, and the continued increase in number of those who have regular school privileges, the percentage of illiteracy in Porto Rico will soon be as low as it is in some of the States of the Union."

What territory when admitted to statehood had a percentage of illiteracy lower than Porto Rico? Louisiana had in the year 1913, after a century of statehood, a percentage of 29. Were the 13 Colonies more literate than Porto Rico when the Declaration of Independence was signed? And what about the Latin Republics? We are ready to submit to any test that Congress sees fit to put us to. We are entitled, even if we are small and poor and weak, to know what the future has in store for our children. We must have a political goal to reach, so that discouragement may be replaced by hope. We are not pessimists. We can see no reasonable human ambition beyond the horizon of our people. But what is meant by reasonable? Is statehood reasonable?

To judge from the utterances of American statesmen of high standing, statehood is an utter impossibility. Some persons have deduced the same conclusion from the President's letter. We find now and then in the American press and in the words of good-natured Americans in official position or otherwise loose expressions in favor of statehood for Porto Rico, but aside from these sporadic expressions we must say with the utmost frankness that the problem of our definite status after 30 years of American rule has not been given due consideration by the national administration, the political parties, the American statesmen, the press, and the American people as a whole. A community of one million and a half of American citizens, by adoption, who have as a precious heirloom the old and noble culture which sowed the seed of democracy throughout this entire American continent, not excluding the northern section, is certainly entitled to know its future political status, to ask the American people what its place will be in the Union of free Commonwealths forming the glorious American constellation.

Some of the opinions contrary to the incorporation of Porto Rico—many of them favoring a special status such as we propose—have been compiled by the eminent Porto Rican jurist, Mr. Luis Muñoz Morales, in his work "El Status Político de Puerto Rico," 1921. From said text we transcribe:

"H. Teichmueller, of Texas, in an article entitled 'Expansion and the Constitution,' published in No. 2 of the American Law Review for 1899, page 208, says, in referring to the treaty of Paris:

"'Where do we find authority for holding territory which is never to become part of our Union of States, as dependent colonies, and for governing millions of barbarians, as subjects, by methods unknown and foreign to all the principles of our political organization. * * * To act in good faith and in harmony with our poltical principles and the genius of our institutions, we should invite the inhabitants of these several islands to organize their own governments under our protection, and when they have accomplished this to recognize them as independent states.'"

* * * * * * *

"Mr. John Bradley Thayer, professor of law at Harvard University, in an article entitled 'Our New Possessions,' published in the Harvard Law Review in February, 1899 (12 Harv. Law Rev. 404), summarizes his conclusions in the following energetic terms:

"'Never should we admit any extracontinental State into the Union; it is an intolerable suggestion. I am glad to observe that it is proposed in Congress to insert in the statute for the settlement of the Hawaiian government the express declaration that it is not to be admitted into the Union. The same thing should be done with all the other islands.'"

* * * * * * *

"Mr. Alpheus H. Snow, in his work entitled 'The Administration of Dependencies,' published in 1902, page 593, expresses his opinion thus:

"'All the insular dependencies of the Union and Alaska are probably destined never to be incorporated into the Union as States, because it is best for them and for the Union that they should permanently remain in a relationship of dependence on the Union.'"

"To close these quotations we shall give one from the writings of another President of the United States, His Excellency Woodrow Wilson, who wrote:

"'The dependencies: With the acquisition of Porto Rico and the Philippines as a result of the war with Spain the United States acquired noncontiguous lands already inhabited by people differing from ourselves in language, customs, and institutions. Unlike the territory previously acquired, with the exception of Alaska and Hawaii, the insular possessions are not adapted for the progressive development from Territories to States. They are dependencies, and will remain as such until they reach the stage when they may become independent or self-governing.'" (The State, p. 357.)

And now we shall add the following:

H. G. Wells, in his Outline of History, Volume IV, page 1203, writes:

"It is improbable that either Porto Rico or the Philippines will ever become States in the Union. They are much more likely to become free states in some comprehensive alliance with both English-speaking and Latin America."

On the same page he reproduces the following remarks of President Roosevelt in connection with the Philippine Islands, which are applicable to Porto Rico:

"We are governing, and have been governing, the islands in the interest of the Filipinos themselves. If after due time the Filipinos themselves decide that they do not wish to be thus governed, then I trust that we will leave; * * *

"This is an entirely different outlook from that of a British or French foreign office or colonial office. But it is not very widely different from the spirit that created the Dominions of Canada, South Africa, and Australia, and brought forward the three home rule bills for Ireland. It is in the older and more characteristic English tradition from which the Declaration of Independence derives. It sets aside, without discussion, the detestable idea of 'subject peoples.'"

Professor Snow makes a more concrete statement of his opinion on the status of noncontiguous territory in these words:

"The metropolitan nation is to extend its own representative and republican institutions under its own constitution by incorporating into its body politic such contiguous lands and communities as it deems best, after preparing them for participation in its inner life. The colonies, which are so distant that they can never be incorporated in this body politic, it protects and develops into self-governing states as rapidly as possible, having for its ultimate object the evolution of a federalistic empire composed of itself and a body of self-governing states, connected and united by bonds of interest and amity, of which empire it shall be the representative and head. This new federalistic empire is, as has been said, based on different principles from those which govern a strict federal union like the United States." (See "Neutralization v. Imperialism," American Journal of International Law, July, 1908.)

The program of the twenty-seventh annual convention of the Lake Mohonk conference contained the following conclusion:

"It does not necessarily mean either eventual statehood or eventual independence for our island possessions. It may mean self-government under American protection and subject to American sovereignty."

The noted publicist, Dr. Lyman Abbott, in the Outlook of November 6, 1909, made the following comment on said program:

"The Outlook agrees entirely with all the declarations of this program. But this review is ready to say even more than the Lake Mohonk conference unanimously said. We do not believe that our insular possessions will ever become States of the Union. Neither do we believe that when said countries are prepared to receive independence they will apply for it. Neither do we believe they should be obliged to accept independence. It is our opinion that their present form of government should be remodeled so as to lead to final self-government under an American protectorate and under American sovereignty. We believe that this is what the majority of the brainier citizens of Porto Rico and of the Philippines desire * * *." (Translated from Spanish version.)

In his message to Congress, dated December 18, 1912, the President of the United States, William H. Taft, expressed himself as follows:

"The failure to grant American citizenship continues to be the only ground of dissatisfaction. I believe that the demand for citizenship is just. But it should be remembered that the demand must be, and in the minds of most Porto Ricans is, entirely disassociated from, any thought of statehood. I believe that no substantial approved public opinion in the United States or in Porto Rico contemplates statehood for the island as the ultimate form of relation between us. I believe that the aim to be striven for is the fullest possible allowance of legal and fiscal self-government, with American citizenship as the bond between us; in other words, a relation analogous to the present relation between Great Britain and such self-governing colonies as Canada and Australia."

In Harvey's Weekly (1923) the American ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. George Harvey, said the following:

"The unwritten law promulgated by Marcy in 1855 and repeatedly reaffirmed since then, is that overseas, noncontiguous territories shall not be admitted to the Federal Union. Certainly, it would require a very powerful reason to annul this law and thus bring to Washington Senators and Representatives from Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands the islands of Luzón and Mindanao, and the Zulu Islands. Are we going to replace the Constitution by a 'Constitution of the United States of America, the East and West Indies, and the Pacific Islands'?" (Translated from the Spanish version.)

From an interview of the Secretary of State, Hon. Elihu Root, with the Porto Rican national Republican committeeman, we quote:

"You have a civilization older than, and different from, ours. Your idea of citizenship and other fundamental principles of life are looked at by your people—Roman after all—from a viewpoint different from the one we Anglo-Saxons take; and even certain moral principles are considered differently by both. In common we have but a great deal of good will on both sides, but that is not sufficient. That can not fill the broad, deep gap existing between both races without taking into account the one already caused by nature itself. This country of ours is becoming larger every day; our internal problems are constantly multiplying, and we can hardly give attention to matters of our own. And if this is so, what right have we to try to govern a country from a distance of over 1,000 miles? Without asking you, I am certain that we are misgoverning you, since we have to place a government at such a distance in the hands of men who will surely not understand you; and by the same logic we know that however badly you may do it yourselves, you will surely do it better than the men we are sending you. You must never expect to become a State of the Union. We have put an end to the last two continental territories by making them States. Alaska is of such small population that when she is sufficiently grown, the solution of the problem will be met by our descendants. Hawaii will some day become a Republic. Porto Rico can not expect to escape from the natural influence of surroundings and should also become a Republic under an American protectorate, so that you may not have to worry about foreign nations and the expense that an Army and Navy entails." (Translated from the Spanish version.)

The Hon. William A. Jones, chairman of the House Committee on Insular Affairs, whose name our organic act bears, expressed himself in the following terms:

"No political party or important newspaper has favored statehood, according to my information. If Porto Rico were admitted to statehood there would be two senators and at least half a dozen Porto Rican representatives; and the fear exists that they might exercise a decisive influence in the United States Congress and practically enact laws for the Government of the United States. For this reason I believe there is no opinion favorable in the United States." (Translated from the Spanish version.)

We are conscious of our duty to aid the nation to solve the problem of our status by suggesting a scheme of government by which the insular and national interests, the attributes of American sovereignty, and the rights and dignity of the Porto Rican people may be reconciled and harmonized.

We are not urging upon the American people either independence or statehood. If statehood is offered to our people now, it is our honest belief that Porto Rico would not, could not, refuse the honor that statehood implies in spite of such financial difficulties as we would have to solve with the aid of Congress. If independence is tendered to us we will accept independence on the same basis as our sister, Cuba. But we suggest as a compromise between these extreme solutions a form of government that is neither statehood nor independence, but which, however, participates of both forms, with the advantages of both and without the disadvantages of either.

We limit our ambitions for the present to an elective governor, leaving to the President the power of removal for cause. We apprehend the objections that can be raised against our interference in purely national affairs, but in compensation for this limitation and on account of our peculiar conditions we do not seek power to frame our own tariff, as was the case under the autonomic charter, but we do seek authority to reduce the national schedules on raw food staples so as to place the same within the reach of our laboring population, and also the power to increase tariff rates on products similar to those of our soil not produced in continental United States when such products of ours are unprotected by the national tariff. We want the jurisdiction of the Federal court restricted in civil matters to suits in which the construction of the Federal Consitution or of the constitution of Porto Rico is in question, and also that Federal jurisdiction be vested, as in the case of the Territories, in the Supreme Court of Porto Rico, which is wholly appointed by the President with the consent of the United States Senate. This would absolutely guarantee the sovereign powers of the Nation.

We ask that as in the case of the Philippine Islands, and since we have no participation in their enactment, laws enacted by Congress shall not apply to Porto Rico unless adopted by the Porto Rican Legislature. We suggest that internal revenue on imported articles be collected by the proper customhouse and postal officials under the direction of the Porto Rican treasurer. As the interstate commerce laws are not in force in Porto Rico, we ask the right to legislate on commerce and to deal freely and justly with the problems of absenteeism and land holdings. We wish also to enact our own bankruptcy law, now superseded by the Federal act, and to have jurisdiction granted to our courts in this matter, in order to protect our commerce against the prohibitive expenses of proceedings of this kind in the Federal court.

We adopted prohibition by a referendum of our people and regulated this matter by act of our legislature. We are entitled, therefore, to have local enforcement of the constitutional prohibition clause intrusted to us. We object to the absolute veto power of the governor, even if he were elective. We believe in the American principle of vesting power to override the veto in two-thirds of the membership of both houses. We further object to the extraordinary power vested in the governor to eliminate items from the general appropriation bill and to reduce items of expenditure without submitting his objections to the legislature, and we want power vested in the legislature to neutralize the governor's veto by a two-thirds vote of the assembly. We also object to the present system of placing purely legislative matters in the hands of the commissioner of education and the auditor. We object to the 5 per cent limitation on the borrowing capacity of municipalities, because that limit had already been reached by a large number of the local governments when the restriction was enacted by Congress. We want a cabinet wholly appointed by the governor with the consent of the Senate. It is our desire that all the justices of the supreme court be natives of Porto Rico, and also that writs of error to review decisions of the Supreme Court of Porto Rico issue out of the Supreme Court of the United States and not out of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, as at present, and only in such cases as where writs are issued to review decisions of the supreme courts of the States. We claim the power to regulate the manner of selecting the members of the judiciary, and also to organize the public service commission. We ask that the House of Representatives be empowered to impeach all officers of Porto Rico subject to impeachment in accordance with the spirit of the Federal Constitution, without excluding the governor, such officers to be tried by the senate, presided over by the chief justice of the supreme court. And last, but not of least importance, we ask that after our constitution shall have been approved by Congress no amendment shall be made thereto except with the consent of the people of Porto Rico. We are well aware that our constitution, since it would not be a State constitution in a strict constitutional sense, because it would not be a compact between the Union and Porto Rico, could be amended by Congress, whose authority could not be restricted in any way by such constitution; but we trust in the uprightness and justice of Congress, and we know that a provision inserted in our constitution providing that it shall not be amended without the assent of the people of Porto Rico would be considered by Congress as if the same were inserted in the Federal Constitution itself. This is a moral guaranty of such high character that our people would not hesitate to accept it. For this very reason we would submit to the supervisory power of Congress over the laws enacted by our legislature.

Porto Rico would have almost all the rights and privileges enjoyed by the States—except national representation—besides certain additional local powers justified by our peculiar situation. We would be associated with, though not incorporated into the Union. In this way both peoples would be joined by a common flag, a common sovereignty, and a common citizenship. We would be bound to each other by ties of mutual interests, aspirations, and affection, and Porto Rico would be in a position to constitute the spiritual isthmus between the Americas—the foundation for a bridge of ideals between the two continents, the two races, and the two civilizations of the Western Hemisphere. This is our answer to the question raised by the Chief Magistrate of the Nation.

THE GRANT OF GREATER AUTONOMY AND THE MARKET

"In what way, by a greater grant of autonomy, could Porto Rico so look after the market for its products or the market for its bonds, or in what way could it improve the economic position of its government or its people?" (The President.)

Political autonomy is not incompatible with economic independence. We would look to the United States for markets and protection, because we would be an associated free unit of the American Commonwealth under a constitution based on mutuality of interests, reciprocity of service, perfect understanding, bonds of gratitude, political ties, common citizenship and institutions, solidarity of purpose, and unity of ideals.

THE GOOD NAME OF THE UNITED STATES

We respect the feeling expressed that "the United States is entitled to a good name in its dealings with Porto Rico and to protect itself from every reflection on its good name."

We say with all candor that the good name and the honor of the Nation is as dear to our Porto Rican hearts as it may possibly be to any citizen born on the continent. We proved the foregoing assertion by deeds when we offered to the Nation, without compulsion, the flower of our youth to be sent to Europe to fight and die for the good name and the honor of the United States; when we oversubscribed our share in the several Liberty and Victory bond issues and covered all our quotas in the several war activities; when our finances suffered the effects of the armed conflict and we endured the privations imposed on our people by the detriment caused to our commerce and the sinking of vessels sailing from our ports, with the resulting loss of life and property.

Witness of our contribution during the war is found in the following tribute by Dr. Albert Shaw:

"About a month after this measure of 1917, known as the Jones Act, had given the people of Porto Rico their present full rights of American citizenship, our Government declared war against Germany. Through their representatives these new citizens did not hesitate to express their loyalty and to accept the responsibilities of the war period. The draft act was cheerfully supported, and in a short time more than 15,000 young Porto Ricans were in Army camps. When the war was over, about 25,000 Porto Ricans had been in uniform, largely under Porto Rican officers; and their training had excellent results in physical and mental development. Just now—April, 1921—we are told that the National Guard of Porto Rico stands at the head of the entire list of States and Territories in filling quotas assigned by the War Department." (The American Review of Reviews, May, 1921, pp. 483-84.)

There has been a natural hesitation to recall and dwell upon our share in the war; but Porto Rico is also entitled to a good name in its dealings with the United States.

By granting the island a republican form of government under the jurisdiction of the United States, Congress and the President would show to the world as well as to Porto Rico that "There is no disposition in America and certainly not on my part," as the President says, "to discourage any reasonable aspiration of the people of Porto Rico."

In the following statement, we agree with the President:

"The island has so improved and its people have so progressed in the last generation as to justify high hopes for the future, but it certainly is not unreasonable to ask that those who speak for Porto Rico limit their petitions to those things which may be granted without a denial of such hope."

In view of this advice, we restrict our political ambitions to limits that are both reasonable and just. Under the scheme of government suggested, the following closing paragraph of the President's letter would be fully justified:

"Nor is it unreasonable to suggest that the people of Porto Rico, who are a part of the people of the United States, will progress with the people of the United States rather than isolated from the source from which they have received practically their only hope of progress."

And said paragraph would be justified because it is not our desire to be isolated from the United States. On the contrary, we look for association with them. But association implies equality, coordination—not subordination. Equality and a perfect association would be feasible by means of the form of government suggested, leaving it to future progress to determine the shaping of the final form of association between the United States and Porto Rico.

Our hope and aspiration is that closer and closer relations will be established between the two countries, based on good will, mutual interest, and perfect understanding.

In closing, and as an inspiration for both the American and the Porto Rican people, allow us to repeat the imperishable words of Abraham Lincoln that so precisely and appropriately summarize the spirit of American institutions and ideals:

"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in."

Fraternally yours,

(Signed) ANTONIO R. BARCELÓ,
President of the Senate.
(Signed) JOSÉ TOUS SOTO,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

EXHIBIT I

ART. 2. Each island shall be governed by an insular parliament, consisting of two chambers, and by the governor general, representing the mother country, who shall exercise supreme authority.

ART. 3. The legislative power as to colonial matters in the shape and manner prescribed by law shall be vested in the insular chambers conjointly with the governor general.

ART. 5. The council shall be composed of 35 members, of whom 18 shall be elected in the manner directed by the electoral law and 17 shall be appointed by the governor general acting for the Crown from among such persons as have the qualifications specified in the following articles:

ART. 6. To be entitled to sit in the council of administration it is necessary to be a Spanish subject, to have attained the age of 35 years, to have been born in the island, or to have had four years' constant residence therein.

ART. 13. Representatives shall be elected every five years, and any representative may be reelected any number of times.

ART. 15. The chambers will meet every year. The King, the governor general acting in his name, shall convene, suspend, and adjourn the sessions and dissolve the chamber of representatives and the council of administration, either separately or simultaneously, under the obligation to call them together again or renew them within three months.

ART. 17. Each chamber shall choose its president, vice president, and secretaries.

ART. 18. Neither chamber shall sit unless the other be sitting also, except when the council exercises judicial functions.

ART. 21. All colonial statutes in regard to taxes and the public credit shall originate in the chamber of representatives.

ART. 26. No councilor of administration shall be indicted or arrested without a previous resolution of the council, unless he shall be found in fraganti or the council shall not be in session, but in every case notice shall be given to that body as soon as possible that it may determine what should be done.

ART. 29. Besides the power of enacting laws for the colony the insular chambers shall have power—

1. To receive the oath of the governor general to preserve the constitution and the laws which guarantee the autonomy of the colony.

2. To enforce the responsibility of the secretaries of the executive, who shall be tried by the council whenever impeached by the chamber of representatives.

ART. 32. The insular chambers shall have power to pass upon all matters not specially and expressly reserved to the Cortes of the Kingdom or to the central government as herein provided or as may be provided hereafter, in accordance with the prescription set forth in additional article 2.

In this manner, and without implying that the following enumeration presupposes any limitation of the power to legislate on other subjects, they shall have power to legislate on all matters and subjects concerning the departments of justice, interior, treasury, public works, education, and agriculture.

They shall likewise have exclusive cognizance of all matters of a purely local nature which may principally affect the colonial territory; and to this end they shall have power to legislate on civil administration, on provincial, municipal, or judicial apportionment, on public health, by land or sea, and on public credit, banks, and the monetary system.

ART. 33. It shall be incumbent upon the colonial parliament to make regulations under such national laws as may be passed by the Cortes and expressly intrusted to it. Especially among such measures parliament shall legislate, and may do so at the first sitting, for the purpose of regulating the elections, the taking of the electoral census, qualifying electors, and exercising the right of suffrage; but in no event shall these dispositions affect the rights of the citizens as established by the electoral laws.

ART. 34. The governor general in council shall have, as far as the island of Cuba is concerned, the same power that has been vested heretofore in the minister for the colonies for the appointment of the functionaries and subordinate and auxiliary officers of the judicial order and as to the other matters connected with the administration of justice.

(The foregoing article also applied to Porto Rico, according to the provision of additional article 3, which reads: "The provisions of the present decree shall obtain in their entirety in the island of Porto Rico.")

ART. 35. The insular parliament shall have exclusive power to frame the local budget of expenditures and revenues, including the revenue corresponding to the island as her quota of the national budget.

ART. 37. All treaties of commerce affecting the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, be they suggested by the insular or by the home governmene, shall be made by the latter, with the cooperation of special delegates duly authorized by the colonial government, whose concurrence shall be acknowledged upon submitting the treaties to the Cortes.

Said treaties, when approved by the Cortes, shall be proclaimed as laws of the kingdom and as such shall obtain in the colony.

ART. 38. Notice shall be given to the insular government of any commercial treaties made without its participation as soon as said treaties shall become laws, to the end that, within a period of three months, it may declare its acceptance of nonacceptance of their stipulations. In case of acceptance the governor general shall cause the treaty to be published in the Gazette as a colonial statute.

ART. 39. The insular parliament shall also have power to frame the tariff and fix the duties to be paid on merchandise as well for its importation into the territory of the island as for the exportation thereof.

ART. 40. As a transition from the old régime to the new constitution, and until the home and insular governments may otherwise conjointly determine hereafter, the commercial relations between the island and the metropolis shall be governed by the following rules:

No. 1. No differential duty, whether fiscal or otherwise, either on imports or exports, shall be imposed to the detriment of either insular or peninsular production.

No. 2. The two governments shall make a schedule of articles of direct national origin to which shall be allowed by common consent preferential duty over similar foreign products.

In another schedule made in like manner shall be determined such articles of direct insular production as shall be entitled to privileged treatment on their importation into the peninsula and the amount of preferential duties thereon.

ART. 44. No executive order of the governor general, acting as representative and chief of the colony, shall take effect unless countersigned by a secretary of the cabinet, who by this act alone shall make himself responsible for the same.

ART. 46. The secretaries of the cabinet may be members of either the chamber of representatives or the council of administration and take part in the debates of either chamber, but a secretary shall only vote in the chamber of which he is a member.

ART. 47. The secretaries of the cabinet shall be responsible to the insular parliament.

ART. 67. Should any question of jurisdiction be raised between the insular parliament and the governor general in his capacity as representative of the home government, which shall not have been submitted to the council of ministers of the kingdom by petition of the insular parliament, either party shall have power to bring the matter before the supreme court of the kingdom, which shall render its decision by a full bench and in the first instance.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLES

ART. 2. When the present constitution shall be once approved by the cortes of the kingdom for the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico it shall not be amended, except by virtue of a special law and upon the petition of the council of administration.

TRANSITORY PROVISIONS

ARTICLE 1. With the view of carrying out the transition from the present régime to the system hereby established with the greatest possible dispatch and the least interruption of the public business, the governor general shall, whenever he deems it timely and after consulting the home government, appoint the secretaries of the executive office as per article 45 of this decree, and with their aid he shall conduct the local government of the island until the insular chambers shall have been constituted. The secretaries thus appointed shall vacate their offices as soon as the governor general shall take his oath of office before the insular chambers, and the governor general shall immediately appoint as their successors the members of parliament who, in his judgment, most fully represent the majorities in the chamber of representatives and the council of administration."

EXHIBIT II

Attention was called in my last report to the opposition being made to the collection of the taxes in Porto Rico, principally by the large taxpayers. Changes were made in the laws removing objectional features, and it was hoped that the revenues collected would be sufficient to meet the requirements of the government. But that hope was not realized, and the same condition existed down to the beginning of the present fiscal year. The estimate of the amount of income tax for the year ending June 30, 1925, was $3,000,000. The amount collected was $1,450,000. The estimate of internal revenue was $4,000,000. The amount collected was $3,281,000. The deficiency on those two items alone amounted to $2,270,000. The revenue collected on other items exceeded the estimate, but not enough to overcome this loss.

The opposition took the form of litigation contesting the validity of the taxes levied and a great many injunctions were issued by the courts, especially by the United States district court. As a result, a large part of the revenue was tied up in the courts, although every effort was made to collect the delinquent taxes and to bring the cases to trial.

Because of this condition it became necessary for the legislature to arrange for the levying and collection of additional taxes to make up the deficiency until the cases pending could be decided, and to provide means to satisfy the debt created by the default in payment of the taxes levied. This was done by the legislature at its last session, which convened in February. The new laws were not recommended by Professor Haig, and are not to be considered as part of the permanent tax and revenue system of the island.

The passage of these laws materially increasing the revenue, together with the reduction of the budget, it is confidently expected will enable the treasury to meet all current demands and acquire a surplus to assist in liquidating the floating debt. The new laws are not to be regarded as finalities. They are in a sense experimental and were enacted primarily to meet an emergency.

The amount of these taxes due and delinquent, and which are not at present collected because of litigation, injunctions, and protests is, without interest and penalties, $5,610,747. If these taxes had been paid when due, there would have been no floating debt, and when collected they alone will be sufficient to wipe it out.

What if these people were merely innocent victims of a disease, modern only in name? What if the brand placed by the Spaniard, the Englishman, and the Frenchman in olden times upon the jibaro of Porto Rico were a bitter injustice? The early reports savor strongly of those touristic impressions of the island which from time to time crop out in the press of modern America, in which "laziness and worthlessness" of the "natives" are to be inferred, if, indeed, these very words are not employed to describe a sick workingman, with only half of the blood he should have in his body.

We can not believe that vicious idleness comes natural to the Spanish colonist, even in the Tropics, for the very reason that we have seen these descendants at their very worst, after the neglect of four centuries by their mother country, and after the laborious increase of an anemic population in the face of a deadly disease, whose nature was neither known nor studied, work from sunrise to sunset and seek medical attention, not because they felt sick but "because they could no longer work."

Thus the poor laborer, his earning capacity cut down by his disease, with employment which is at best very irregular, with his sick wife and children for whom he has to buy "iron tonics" that cost all that he can rake and scrape together, without money for clothes, much less for shoes, with a palm-bark hut not too well protected against the damp, cold of the grove in which he lives, with not a scrap of furniture save, perhaps, a hammock, and, worst of all, with a miserable diet lacking in proteids and fats, lives from day to day, saving nothing, knowing nothing of the world beyond his plantation, working mechanically simply because he is not the drone he has been too frequently painted outside of Porto Rico, but without any object save to keep on living as generations have done before him. It has been our experience that when he is asked, "Why have you sought our dispensary?" the answer has almost invariably been, "Because I can no longer work." The jibaro, nevertheless, has ever been the lever which has raised the bank account of Porto Rico, and with an average of 40 per cent of hemoglobin and two and a half millions of red corpuscles per cubic millimeter he has labored from sun to sun in the coffee plantations of the mountains, in the sugar estates of the coast land, and in the tobacco fields of the foothills, in addition to his personal cooperation in other industries and commercial enterprises. He is a sick man and deserves our highest respect, and merits our most careful attention as a vital element in the economic life of the island. The American people should take seriously into account his future, which is at present anything but promising. (Pages 17–18.)

EXHIBIT IV

It has been estimated that the wealth of the island is in the hands of about 15 per cent of the population, and that the remaining 85 per cent are practically dependent upon uncertain labor and wage conditions for their maintenance.

The economic situation in Porto Rico is giving rise to the formation of classes based on wealth. With the introduction of available markets and modern methods of commerce and industry which followed the American occupation, the land values rapidly increased. The small landholder, seeing the increase in price which came about and believing that it was to his best advantage to sell his land, disposed of it to the representatives of large landholding concerns for what, to him, was a fabulous price. As soon as the money from this sale was expended, the original landholder found himself absolutely dependent upon the mercy of a wage-paying employer. In this way a great part of small landholdings passed into the hands of representatives of large landholdings and caused the formation of two groups, the capitalistic group, which is limited to a comparatively small number of people, and the wage-earning group, which comprises probably 90 per cent of the population of Porto Rico. As a result we lack in Porto Rico the great middle class of financially independent farmers which constitutes the strength of the United States and the more prosperous European countries. A serious and systematic effort to build up a prosperous and independent middle class, either by encouraging small-farm or other industries, is necessary if the majority of the people are to attain the advantages which they should enjoy, and if the social and economic status of the island is to be made equitable and stable.

EXHIBIT V

There is no doubt but that many of the consensual marriages are considered by the parties concerned just as permanent as those performed by civil or ecclesiastical authorities, and the question of immorality does not enter into their view of the situation. It is a question of mutual consent, and especially in the country districts, the knowledge of the law in regard to these matters is very vague.

The average family lives very happily and contentedly, the parents displaying great affection for the children and for relatives even of a remote degree of relationship. In the case of the death of parents, relatives usually adopt or take charge of the children which may be left and bring them up as carefully as they would children of their own. The family group is naturally closer among Latin peoples than among Anglo-Saxon races, and this has tended to do away with some of the vices of family life which are found among Anglo-Saxon peoples, while the same circumstances have tended to increase other unsatisfactory conditions of family life peculiar to Latin races.

EXHIBIT VII

The food of the jibaro is poor in fats and the proteids are of difficult assimilation, being of vegetable origin, as a rule.

He arises at dawn and takes a coconut dipperful of café puya (coffee without sugar). Naturally, he never uses milk. With this black coffee he works till about 12 o'clock, when his wife brings him his breakfast, corresponding to our lunch. This is composed of boiled salt codfish, with oil, and has one of the following vegetables of the island to furnish the carbohydrate element: Banana, plantain, yam, sweet potato, or yautia.

At 3 in the afternoon he takes another dipperful of coffee, as he began the day. At dusk he returns to his house and has one single dish, a sort of stew, made of the current vegetables of the island, with rice and codfish. At rare intervals he treats himself to pork, of which he is inordinately fond, and on still rarer occasions he visits the town and eats quantities of bread, without butter, of course.

Of all this list of country food there are only three elements that are bought—rice, codfish, and condiments. Rice is imported from the United States and codfish from Nova Scotia. The bread he eats on his visits to town is made of American flour.

On page 44 of the same book we find:

"That the Porto Rican laborer is of cheerful disposition is especially true of the so-called jibaro. He greets you with a smile, he welcomes you to his house and cheerfully divides his cup of coffee with you, he dances with a show of gayety on a Sunday afternoon. He is ever cheerful, but not happy. There may be some customs and prejudices of minor importance that he is loath to change, but in the main he prefers to live as he does because he is obliged so to live. Those who adhere to the laissez faire policy and believe that conditions are good enough as they are, do not know the real heart of these people. They need and deserve and must ultimately receive the opportunity to improve their living and working conditions."

APPENDIX

FULL TEXT OF THE CABLEGRAMS ADDRESSED BY MESSRS. BARCELÓ AND TOUS SOTO TO PRESIDENT COOLIDGE AND TO THE SIXTH PAN AMERICAN CONFERENCE

To His Excellency ORESTES FERRARA,
President of the Sixth Pan American Conference,
Habana, Cuba:

Devoid of representation to raise our voice at that Pan American Congress, and with legitimate right to do so, being, as we are, equal to the Spanish Republics represented there, a people also Spanish of equal ethnical origin, of the same traditions, the same language, and the same ideals, we beg you to give your indorsement to the following cablegram that we have just addressed to the President of the United States of America, Hon. Calvin Coolidge:

To His Excellency the President, Hon. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
Washington, D. C.:

We congratulate your excellency for speech before Sixth Pan American Conference at Habana, transcending a great spirit of fraternity and friendship toward all the countries of America which are now sharing with your great Nation, before history, the mighty responsibilities of a wise, democratic, and humane policy, whereby all selfishness, so dangerous to the peace and happiness of the world, is cast aside and whereby justice and self-determination for all is bravely proclaimed; and we beseech that you make effective in your recommendations to Congress, now assembled, the wonderful language of that brave speech, so worthy of a great American.

Porto Rico feels humiliated because of the inferior condition she is subjected to in spite of the hopes the treaty of Paris awoke in us; in spite of the unfulfilled promises made to our people, and in spite of the repeated legitimate demands in favor of a régime that may enable our island to exercise her own sovereignty over her own internal affairs and to freely solve the grave economical situation she is undergoing.

Ours is the only Spanish-American country whose voice has not been heard at Habana during the Pan American conference, for it was not represented there, and we are now cabling to Habana asking our sister nations of America, now meeting there, to join us in making this petition to your excellency.

If the United States, because precedent forbids it, or because of different ethnological conditions, or because of our geographical separation from the North American Continent, or because of the incompatibility of interests between both peoples, can not make of our island but a mere subjected colony, then we ask to be allowed to be constituted as a free State, concerting thus with your great Republic such good and fraternal relations as may be necessary for the mutual welfare of the United States and Porto Rico and to the dignity of our citizens.

Justice and nothing but justice is what we ask as citizens of America, as faithful Christians, and as children of the Almighty God that gave us the same inalienable rights your great Republic knew how to invoke when declaring for independence at the memorable convention at Philadelphia.

ANTONIO R. BARCELÓ,
President of the Senate of Porto Rico.
JOSÉ TOUS SOTO,
Speaker of the House of Representatives of Porto Rico.

SAN JUAN, P. R., January 22, 1928.

ORESTES FERRARA, ANTONIO SÁNCHEZ BUSTAMANTE, AND CHARLES E. HUGHES,
Sixth Pan American Conference, Habana, Cuba:

In our cablegram to President Coolidge we did not speak of international independence as mistakenly said by Associated Press and United Press, but of internal sovereignty. We do not ask the conference to intervene in domestic affairs of the American Union, but to express its solidarity and sympathy with aspirations of Porto Rico to full political and financial self-government in harmony with President Coolidge's opening speech. We appeal to your acknowledged spirit of justice and intrust you with the defense of our just cause, and suggest that Porto Rico be chosen for the meeting of the next conference, since it is the spiritual bond uniting the two Americas because of its geographic position and the political, juridic, and financial ties binding it to the United States and our historical, ethnical, linguistic, and cultural nexus with Spanish America.

ANTONIO R. BARCELÓ.
JOSÉ TOUS SOTO.

THE WORDS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE TO COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH ON DELIVERING TO HIM THE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE LEGISLATURE OF PORTO RICO

Colonel Lindbergh, yesterday you were present at the spectacle of a people who received with signal and expressive demonstrations of affection the intrepid and valiant explorer of the air who carries his message of love and peace to all the people of America.

The attitude of this people, in receiving you with cheers and applause, signifies something more than the rendering to you of merited homage; it signifies its eagerness to seize upon everything which may signify a hope, a means by which it may make itself felt by those in whose hands destiny placed our fate.

And it is for that that the Legislature of Porto Rico, a true representative of this people, meets to-day to adopt the resolution which I am about to read to you:

"Concurrent resolution to render homage to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh

"Be it resolved by the Senate of Porto Rico (the House of Representatives concurring):

"1. To take to its heart as a guest of honor and to give its most cordial welcome to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, triumphant and glorious, after his having visited various peoples of Central and South America as the ambassador and messenger of peace and fraternity of the United States of America.

"2. That Col. Charles A. Lindbergh be, and hereby is, declared an illustrious citizen of Porto Rico.

"3. That a gold medal be, and hereby is, awarded to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, with which the presiding officer will decorate him at this session. This medal is in commemoration of his visit to this island, and is engraved as follows:

"Obverse. The historical and official coat of arms of Porto Rico.

"Reverse. The following words:

"'The Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico to the glorious aviator, C. A. Lindbergh, in memory of his visit to this island.'

"4. To make him the bearer of a message, which will be delivered to him at a joint session of the legislature, from the people of Porto Rico to the people of the United States.

"5. To direct that a certified caligraphic copy of this resolution be delivered to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh."

In compliance with this resolution, a copy of which I hand you, I shall pin on your dress the commemorative medal to which the same refers, and I hand you also copy of the message mentioned therein, which the speaker of our house of representatives will read to you.

Receive all this, then, in the name of the people of Porto Rico, and tell the United States that here are a people jealous of their origin and history, inflexibly defending their personality, and indeclinably defending their liberty and their rights, and maintaining the high principles and the free and democratic institutions which made your glorious Nation great.

May God keep you, Colonel Lindbergh! May the gentle breezes of my country, when you leave it, carry to you the sentiments of our Porto Rican soul and of its noble and legitimate aspirations.

Concurrent resolution to confer upon Col. Charles A. Lindbergh the representation of the people of Porto Rico as bearer of a message to the people of the United States.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate of Porto Rico concurring):

To confer upon Charles A. Lindbergh the representation of the people of Porto Rico as bearer of the following:

"MESSAGE FROM THE PEOPLE OF PORTO RICO TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, INTRUSTED TO COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

"Colonel Lindbergh, Porto Rico welcomes you. Our first governor, Juan Ponce de Leon, one of the glorious adventurers that accompanied Christopher Columbus on his second voyage, sailed from our shores in quest of the fountain of youth and discovered Florida. Ponce de Leon was the conqueror of our fair island by the force of arms. You will return to your native country from Borinquen along the same route as our counqueror, and, like him, you have conquered Porto Rico by the force of the prestige of your name, by the glory irradiating from the mighty adventure that you, as the knight-errant, conqueror of space, have accomplished.

"Columbus brought to this hemisphere the message of the Old World; a message of civilization and progress. He came to us with the cross and the sword. You have now answered that message in the name of the Americas, both the Saxon and the Latin, because you have truly been the messenger of progress and good will of this whole continent, where you are acclaimed as the son of the great Columbia that expands her brotherhood of free Commonwealths from the frozen sea to the strait discovered by Magellan. You flew to the ancient world with the cross of your faith and the sword of your courage.

"We believe with the great poet Rostand, the younger, that you were led along your aerial path from America to France by the souls of the American youth to the shores of the land where they fought and died for the honor of their country and for the freedom of France and of the world.

"They drew the Spirit of St. Louis by a sort of magnetic force, because you were one of them, because your adventure was sanctified by the same spirit of self-sacrifice, of self-denial, of self-reliance that inspired the sacrifice of their lives for a great and worthy cause. They steered your course; they steadied your hands and nerves; they kept up your alertness and courage; they were your magnetic needle and your polar star; they dispelled the ghost of fear that hovered around your ship; and they fought your way through the four apocalyptic horsemen that surrounded the Spirit of St. Louis, banishing from it the terrors of hunger, sleep, darkness, and death; and they drove your plane, as a dove of peace and love sent from a biblical ark, to the landing place of Le Bourget; but your path was marked by the luminous trail formed by the sighs and tears and sorrow and despair of the mothers, sisters, daughters, and wives of the gallant American soldiers who fell in the Great War.

"The very spirit of St. Louis that prompted the Christian King of France to sail with his army of crusaders to the burning and inhospitable African soil to conquer the Holy City, where the Saviour had his resting place, to meet discomforts and sufferings that he shared with the humblest of his soldiers, to finally face pestilence and death in a deadly, strange land for the sake of his faith and his kingdom was the inspiration that led you to attempt the daring venture.

"Welcome to this country, the last foothold of the glorious nation whose spirit, personified in the noble generosity of Isabella and in the faith and wisdom of Columbus, discovered this continent, where blood that is ours was shed for the cause of Christianity and civilization in America, in our Latin America, and in your Saxon America, where the names of De Soto, Ponce de Leon, and Coronado are linked forever to her history.

"Welcome to our island, Colonel Lindbergh; welcome to the only place under the shadow of Old Glory where the discoverer ever set foot. Welcome, worthy son of the American eagle. Welcome, Lone Eaglet. The good wishes of Porto Rico will go with you to the land of the brave and the free; and to your country and to your people you will convey the message of Porto Rico, not far different from the cry of Patrick Henry, 'Liberty or death.' It is the same in substance, but with the difference imposed by the change of times and conditions. The message of Porto Rico to your people is: 'Grant us the freedom that you enjoy, for which you struggled, which you worship, which we deserve, and you have promised us.' We ask the right to a place in the sun—this land of ours, brightened by the stars of your glorious flag."

Concurrent resolution to consider the letter of President Calvin Coolidge; to request the Congress of the United States of America to appoint a congressional committee to investigate the political, economic, and social conditions of Porto Rico; and to ask for an extension of the term of the present session of the legislature

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of Porto Rico (the Senate of Porto Rico concurring), To address the following cablegram to the President and to the Congress of the United States, through the Hon. FÉLIX CÓRDOVA DÁVILA, Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico in Washington:

"In view of the letter addressed by President Calvin Coolidge, through the Governor of Porto Rico, Hon. Horace M. Towner, to the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature, Antonio R. Barceló and José Tous Soto, the Senate and the House of Representatives of Porto Rico resolve to intrust the two latter, exclusively, with such reply to said letter as it is proper and necessary to make, and to request the Congress of the United States to appoint a congressional committee to investigate the political, economic, and social conditions of Porto Rico, said committee to hold public hearings where it shall hear such citizens as request to be heard and who offer to present such data and documents as may be necessary to clarify the facts and to do the justice which is due to Porto Rico; be it further

"Resolved, To request Congress to extend the term established by law for the adjournment of the present legislative session for such time as may be necessary to receive the committee and to aid it in the fulfillment of its mission."

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAWLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12875) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REFLECTIONS ON PENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on pending legislation and include therein a letter I have received from the chairman of the Louisiana Public Service Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the House, there are many theories of government and of life that apparently have to be discussed, considered, and sometimes fought over and then considered again before they become settled policies, which are not disputed by any large number of people in any generation after these policies have been adopted and settled. It is on the anvil of discussion that the spark of truth will fly, but frequently it happens that the spark takes a long time to fly. "Truth crushed to earth will rise again." There are many principles of life expressed by words, slogans, and aphorisms that seem to be possessed of a near immortality.

Political liberty and freedom have been sought after, sacrificed, and fought for during all of the ages, and yet Byron was almost correct I think when he said, "So let them ease their hearts with prate or equal rights which man never knows; I have a love for freedom too."

Some doctrines or principles of government, when bludgeoned or conquered by overwhelming force and apparently stamped out, suddenly spring into a renewed existence and, phœnixlike, rise from the ashes of the past and, according to the fabulous story, into greater strength. Local self-government, State rights, the right to live one's life in accordance with one's own standards provided those standards are not mala in se, rights that are hoary with age, venerable with antiquity, consecrated by the sacrifices made for their maintenance, and hallowed by the immemorable reverence given to them generation after generation and age after age, like Banquo's ghost, will not down at the bidding of even a majority who may count their numbers in millions. State rights apparently immolated at Appomatox are reasserting themselves with a persistency which is evidence of their powerful appeal to the intellect of humanity and their indestructible virtue, which no force can resist or permanently impair, and no tyranny or oppression destroy.

Sometimes it is necessary, I suppose, for a republic to move so expeditiously that its haste makes for waste. It is regrettable that we can not or do not always follow the Latin maxim "Festina lente," "make haste slowly." If we did not run too fast, if we did not operate the Government too rapidly, there would be many things done in a more orderly and sagacious manner, which would build up step after step more efficiently and economically than is secured in measures which have to be amended in a way that undoes them and makes for backtracking. It is lost motion. But I suppose it is a part of the way that we of America have the habit of doing things. That thought, while consoling, in a way is not so reassuring for the future welfare of our country.

There is, of course, a school of politicians in every country who are convinced that the proper policy to pursue in furthering the interest of a State and in promoting the happiness of its people is laissez faire, which may be literally translated into an attitude expressed so well years ago by the "stand-pat" slogan of the Republican Party, and which is in course of reaffirmation to-day by and through the political maxims "Go slow," "Don't disturb business," "Let well enough alone." That policy is probably a good one to follow when it is pursued consistently, continuously, without break or interruption, but its efficacy and virtue may be questioned when it is followed intermittently and thoughtlessly. By way of illustration, if that policy had appealed when the Department of Agriculture was brought into existence, that expensive institution would never have been created. For it is an immense institution, not from the standpoint of a large and varied force that it has to employ here and in the field throughout the country, but from the angle of the tremendous power it exerts upon the farms of the country and their products, even to a certain extent after they have passed out of the hands of the producer. There are many people who believe that the Department of Agriculture has not come as "good tidings of a great joy," but rather as a message of grief to the agriculturists of the country, for it has undoubtedly stimulated production to such an extent as to make for a glut on the market of farm products, and thereby has led to that depression in price which has made the life of the average farmer a burden rather than a grand, sweet song. Then there is the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was created in the face of a most violent opposition from the railroads of the country. Feared and hated at its birth by the magnates, it has grown up into such a magnificent state that it is questionable whether or not the railroads would not use their undoubted influence throughout the country to preserve the Interstate Commerce Commission were it assailed as an asset to the public. But the law of compensation is always in operation, and the fact that there is good and evil in all things, even to the extent that there is good in evil and evil in good, is obvious to even the most callous and unobservant of our citizens who have stood on the side lines and witnessed the development of bureaus and commissions in the expanding life of the United States of America.

While the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States has been growing daily and gathering tremendous strength and power the State commissions, the purpose of whose existence from the viewpoint of the several Commonwealths is the same as that of the Federal functionary to the entire country, have been dwindling in power and are rapidly reaching the vanishing point in influence as rate-making bodies. If the growth continues much longer in the direction of power and authority on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the gradual diminution of authority on the part of the State commissions persists, the latter will soon become useless and will go out of existence as a result of a process of deterioration similar to that of atrophy. An effort is being made by some of the State commissions to revive the waning influence of these organizations and to combat the growing strength of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In other words local self-government and State rights and sectional freedom are beginning to reassert themselves in unmistakable terms. They are demanding a more specific definition of Federal and State rights in the matter of the making of rates by the States, which is, of course, one of the most important questions concerning the power of a State to live, endure, and function as a Commonwealth. Bills have been introduced in both the House and Senate looking to a clearer definition of jurisdiction, hearings are being held, and the subject matter being considered, perhaps not in as expeditious a manner, however, as many ardent champions of State commissions would like to see. But the irrepressible conflict is on. A revolt is slowly growing up against the rule of America from Washington. Bureaucracy is beginning to find its haughty order questioned and challenged. While not any great advance has been made in the way of overturning the established hierarchy there is a determination on the part of Congress not to create any additional agencies that may gradually grow from the infant state until they are prodigious giants, exercising the power which they have secured in a great growth, arbitrarily, oppressively, and tyrannically. And the people should beware.

The story of the monster created by Frankenstein which finally destroyed its creator should ever be uppermost in the minds of American citizens who wish to preserve whatever freedom and liberty may be enjoyed under a Government exercising political authority over a country as large as ours, as immense in its industrial and commercial power, and with the enormous population that has to live under and according to its rules. I sometimes think that the Interstate Commerce Commission should gradually lose its power and to the extent of the loss its strength should go to the State commissions, because I am quite convinced that if the Interstate Commerce Commission continues to absorb and claim power and to have it conferred upon itself that it will divide this country into as many sections as there are commissions. The fact that the commissioners are selected from different sections of the country is an admission that section demands for representation can not be resisted, and that in turn suggests that looming up on the horizon in the distance are regional differences that may make for schisms that may become a menace to the Union. Perhaps the commission should be a supervisory body, exercising jurisdiction over and determining the legal differences that might spring up between and among the State commissions. One thing is certain, we can not remain stationary; we will either go forward or backward; we will either return their original power to the State commissions or we will take that step which will obliterate them. And then what? Shall the obliteration of the State agencies only be another fierce assault upon the theory of State rights and a long step in the way of that nationalization which inseparably associated with regional representation will breathe rivalries that will sow the seed of dissolution in the life of the great Republic? Or leaving off as I began, will local self-government, a doctrine dear to men in the twilight of history, spring into a stronger existence than ever before? Many watchmen are on the towers. One of them has written me a letter which so clearly and forcefully expresses the determination of the State rights and State commission men that I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks by making it a part of this address:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
LOUISIANA PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION,
New Orleans, La., April 9, 1928.

Hon. JAMES O'CONNOR, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JIM: If section 13 of the interstate commerce act, particularly paragraphs 3 and 4 of that section, is not repealed or modified substantially, State regulation of rates on traffic within the States will slowly but surely be annihilated.

The steady erosion of State rights in the regulation by the States of the business of railroads inside the States has proceeded much more swiftly than anyone expected, considering the well-known and time-honored tendency of "the law's delay."

Even persons and business interests directly concerned in the multiplied and multiplying cases which have served to rob the States of these rights have been most of them too busy to stop and to look and to see, with a thorough understanding, where and to what section 13 is leading the States of this Union.

Starting with cases in which only one or two or several commodities were involved, the initial success obtained has stimulated and inspired subsequent cases which take in almost the entire list of Louisiana products and on the most trifling showing of hardly more than fictitious discrimination, scales of rates have been ordered in from one end of the State to the other, even to cities and towns so distant that interstate shippers could not compete with the nearer Louisiana shippers no matter what the scale or rates might be. The net result of this blanketing of Louisiana with rates which have in practically every important instance been increases has been to increase transportation costs for everybody, including the interstate shipper whose discrimination complaint served as the possibly innocent yet efficient vehicle for such wholesale increases.

We do not believe that section 13 of the interstate commerce act can constitutionally be invoked for such blanketing rate increases as have happened in the past beyond the point where actual discrimination has been suffered by an interstate shipper. Maybe the States are willing to allow their rights to be invaded to this limited extent, but certainly they are not willing to have all of their purely intrastate rates fixed in Washington in proceedings which begin usually as complaints to remove discrimination to some few points in a State and wind up as general rate-raising engines for the entire Commonwealth.

There are several bills now pending in the United States Senate and House of Representatives having for their purpose the more specific definition of Federal and State rights in this very difficult and most important question of State rate making by the States, and we are anxious that Louisiana's representatives shall be on guard for the protection and preservation of this State's right to regulate its own intrastate affairs.

The list of bills pending is too great to include in this letter but it can be obtained by your secretary from Hon. John E. Benton, general solicitor of the National Association of State Railroad Commissioners, Otis Building, Washington, D. C.

As these Federal encroachments on State freight rates have cost Louisiana and New Orleans millions of dollars in reduced business in the past, I therefore feel it to be my duty to call your attention to the remedial legislation now pending in Congress and to ask for it your deepest study and consideration and active support.

Sincerely,

FRANCIS WILLIAMS, Chairman.

MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have five legislative days in which to file minority views on H. R. 12821.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to have five legislative days in which to file minority views on H. R. 12821. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10564. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to grant and convey to the county of Warren a perpetual easement for public highway purposes over and upon a portion of the Vicksburg National Military Park in the State of Mississippi.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. SWEET, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. WAINWRIGHT, for two days, on account of urgent business.

To Mr. BANKHEAD, for to-day, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 13, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Mr. TILSON submitted the following tentative list of committee hearings scheduled for Friday, April 13, 1928, as reported to the floor leader by clerks of the several committees:

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

(10 a. m.)

SENATE

FRIDAY, April 13, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O most loving Father, in whose embrace all creatures live, unto whom all souls belong, Thou knowest our every need and lovest us better than we know how to love ourselves. In the gentle hush of Thy presence remove from our hearts all unworthiness, that they may be as pure and stainless as the image of the morning star reflected in a drop of perfumed dew. Make our words and works to throb in unison with the great ebb and flow of things that bespeak contact with the universal mind of God. And grant unto these Thy servants that they may be faithful to every trust, giving utterance to their highest, noblest thought, and so stand forth as leaders who walk the highway of the right, upon whose shoulders rests the great fabric of this Republic. Hear us and bless us, O Father, for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, April 9, 1928, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING

Mr. HEFLIN sent to the desk and had read extracts from the Washington Post and New York Times, and proceeded to address the Senate, when—

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I shall have to ask for the regular order. Speeches are not in order during the presentation of petitions and memorials.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I expect to speak for not over 15 or 20 minutes. The naval appropriation bill will be up in a few minutes. If I am postponed till then, I shall occupy a good deal of time to-day. I could finish my speech now in 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. I request the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is requested, which is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petition of Isabell C. Allen, of Kansas City, Mo., praying for the passage of legislation providing that the sum of $200,000 be set aside for her use and conveyed to her at once from funds remaining in the Treasury of the United States, alleging that it appeared that her son, named in the petition, "Wellington John Clayton Allen, having been her support, was, on or about the 20th day of October, 1927, killed by partaking of industrial alcohol as a beverage, which said alcohol had been poisoned by order of the Secretary of the Treasury," which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted by the Lions Club of Cody and the Kiwanis Club of Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, praying for the passage of legislation to provide for aided and directed settlement on Federal reclamation projects, which were referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Wilbur, Wash., remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 1752) to regulate the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON presented 32 petitions numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of California, praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COPELAND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., and vicinity, remonstrating against the repeal or suspension of the national origins quota provision of the existing immigration law, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., and vicinity, praying for the passage of legislation for the registration of all aliens in the United States and also for alien deportation, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented petitions numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of New York, praying for the passage of legislation repealing the 3 per cent Federal excise tax on passenger automobiles, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TYSON. I present a letter embodying a resolution from the American Legion Auxiliary, unit of Bob Brown Post, No. 16, of Murfreesboro, Tenn., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN LEGION AUXILIARY,
UNIT OF BOB BROWN POST NO. 16,
Murfreesboro, Tenn., April 11, 1928.

To the Hon. L. D. TYSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the regular meeting of the American Legion Auxiliary, unit of Bob Brown Post 16, Department of Tennessee, held on April 5, 1928, the following resolution was unanimously indorsed by its members:

"Whereas there is now before the Seventieth Congress relating to legislation for ex-service men a bill known as the Tyson bill, S. 1986, or the Wurzbach bill, H. R. 6523, also another measure known as the Capper-Johnson universal draft bill, H. R. 8513, S. 1289, for the drafting of industry and money as well as men in times of national need, and we as an organization interested in these matters and the welfare of the Nation feel that the needs for these bills to be enacted are immediate and great, and action upon them should not be postponed to await the next Congress: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That unit of Bob Brown Post 16, American Legion Auxiliary, Department of Tennessee, go on record as unanimously favoring the passage of these bills; and be it further Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to each United States Senator from Tennessee and to our Congressman from this district."

Mrs. M. B. MURFREE, President.
Mrs. J. E. COLEMAN, Treasurer.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram from the Governor of Nebraska and ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LINCOLN, NEBR., April 12, 1928.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Congratulations on your determination to make no further concessions to the opponents of the McNary-Haugen bill. You already have conceded more than any fair-minded critic of the bill should ask. The equalization-fee provision must remain in the bill even though Executive disapproval should be a foregone conclusion. It is the equalization fee that reserves to the farmer economic respectability in the marketing of his products. Without that provision he would be placed in a position of accepting subsidies and favors; he would resent so-called relief of that kind. In the primary election held Tuesday in Nebraska the McNary-Haugen bill was the one and only issue between opposing delegates to the national convention. The proponents of the McNary-Haugen bill have won a decisive majority. If a similar contest had taken place in the Democratic ranks in this State I feel sure the outcome would have been the same. The farmers of Nebraska are overwhelmingly for the legislation outlined in your measure. You have been making a splendid fight for agricultural equality.

ADAM MCMULLEN, Governor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MCNARY, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) to amend section 10 of the act entitled "An act to establish the upper Mississippi River wild life and fish refuge," approved June 7, 1924, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 795) thereon.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1480) authorizing certain Indian tribes and bands, or any of them, residing in the State of Washington, to present their claims to the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 796) thereon.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1718) to authorize the President to detail engineers of the Bureau of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture to assist the governments of the Latin American Republics in highway matters (Rept. No. 797); and

A bill (S. 3674) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 978).

ACQUISITION OF A SITE FOR FARMERS' PRODUCE MARKET

Mr. TYDINGS (for Mr. BRUCE), from the Committee on the District of Columbia submitted the views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 8298) authorizing acquisition of a site for the farmers' produce market, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed as part 2, Report No. 682.

PROPOSED MODIFICATION OF THE VOLSTEAD ACT

Mr. BLAINE. I introduce a bill, which I ask may be read at length.

The bill (S. 4064) to amend the national prohibition act as amended and as published in title 27 of the Code of Laws of the United States of America (44 Stat. L. pt. 1) was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

A bill (S. 4064) to amend the national prohibition act as amended and as published in title 27 of the Code of Laws of the United States of America (44 Stat. L. pt. 1)

Be it enacted, etc., That the national prohibition act as amended and as published in title 27 of the Code of Laws of the United States of America (44 Stat. L., pt. 1) be amended, as follows:

"SECTION 1. Subsection (1) of section 4 and sections 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 29, 31, 32, 35, 50, and 60 are repealed.

"SEC. 2. Subsection (3) of section 4 is amended by substituting for the words 'Commissioner of Internal Revenue' the words 'Commissioner of Prohibition.'

"SEC. 3. A new section is added to chapter 1 to be known as section 6 and to read as follows:

"'SEC. 6. In the enforcement of this title the word "liquor" or the phrase "intoxicating liquor" shall be construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter, and wine, and in addition thereto any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquor, liquids, and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented or not, and by whatever name called which are fit for beverage purposes and which, when moderately used, are in fact intoxicating and which contain 2¾ per cent or more of alcohol by weight: Provided, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any beverage or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, porter, or wine is produced if it contains 2¾ per cent of alcohol by weight or less and is made as prescribed in section 58 of this title, and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter, and is contained and sold in or from sealed and labeled bottles, casks, or containers, as the commissioner may by regulation prescribe.'

"SEC. 4. Eight new sections are added to chapter 2, to be known as sections 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21, respectively, and to read as follows:

"'SEC. 11. No State or Territory subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall pass any law, rule, or regulation to restrict, limit, or enlarge the provisions of this title relating to the manufacture for transportation, sale for transportation, or transportation of liquor for beverage purposes in interstate or foreign commerce, or relating to the articles or liquor exempt under its provisions, or in relation to the manufacture, use, possession, sale, purchase, transportation, distribution, or prescribing of medicinal liquor or wines for sacramental or religious purposes, and any law, rule, or regulation passed by any State or Territory which enlarges, restricts, or limits the provisions of this title shall be null and void.

"'SEC. 12. The manufacture for transportation, sale for transportation, or transportation of liquors in fact intoxicating for beverage purposes, in interstate or foreign commerce, are hereby prohibited, except as otherwise provided in this title.

"'SEC. 16. Nothing in this title shall be held to apply to the manufacture, sale, use, transportation, importation, possession, or distribution of wine for sacramental purposes or like religious rites, except that a permit for the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, and distribution of such wine for such sacramental or religious purposes must be obtained from the commissioner.

"'SEC. 17. The manufacture for transportation, sale for transportation, or transportation in interstate or foreign commerce of any liquors containing alcohol in any degree and which contain poison are hereby prohibited unless the presence of such poison is distinctly shown by a label upon the bottle, container, or package, and upon the outer wrapper thereof, printed in English, in plain and distinct type, with the word "Poison" printed in red, in plain and distinct type, in English. Any person who violates this section shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years, and if deaths should occur in the use of any such liquor, the person who sells or delivers such liquor to such person, without being labeled as above provided, shall be guilty of a homicide, and shall be punished by imprisonment not less than one year nor more than three years.

"'SEC. 18. No person shall manufacture, sell, purchase, or transport any liquors intended for interstate or foreign commerce or for medicinal use without first having obtained a permit from the commissioner so to do, except that a person without a permit may purchase, possess, use, and transport in interstate or foreign commerce liquor for medicinal purposes when prescribed by a physician holding a permit as prescribed in section 20 of this title, and except that any person who, in the opinion of the commissioner, is conducting a bona fide hospital or sanitarium engaged in the treatment of persons suffering from alcoholism or any affliction in the treatment of which the physician in charge thereof directs the use of liquor may, under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the commissioner shall prescribe, purchase, transport, and use liquor to be administered to the patients of such institution under the direction of a duly qualified physician at said institution. All permits under this section shall be valid until revoked by the commissioner for the violation of any law or regulation relating to intoxicating liquors.

"'SEC. 19. No permit shall be issued to anyone to sell liquor at retail in interstate or foreign commerce under the provisions of section 18 of this chapter unless the sale is to be made through a pharmacist licensed under the laws of his State to compound and dispense medicine prescribed by a duly licensed physician.

"'SEC. 20. No person shall issue any prescription for the use of liquor for medicinal purposes other than a physician duly licensed to practice medicine and actively engaged in the practice thereof who has obtained a permit to prescribe liquor from the commissioner. No physician holding a permit shall issue any prescription for liquor until after careful physical examination of the person for whose use such prescription is sought, or, if such examination is found impracticable, then upon the best information obtainable. Not more than a pint of spirituous liquor or a quart of vinous liquor or 4 quarts of malt liquor, to be taken internally, shall be prescribed for use by the same person within any period of 10 days, unless two physicians duly licensed to practice medicine shall certify that a greater quantity is necessary for use by the same person.

"'SEC. 21. The commissioner shall prescribe the form of all permits, certificates, and applications therefor, and the facts to be set forth therein, and the form of records to be kept under the provisions of this act.'

"SEC. 5. Section 30 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the words 'intended for use in interstate or foreign commerce.'

"SEC. 6. Section 45 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: 'Provided, That all of the officers and persons named herein shall be subject to prosecution in the State courts for the violation of any of the laws of such State and in such prosecution there shall be no transfer of the case from a State court to a court of the United States, and no process shall issue out of any of the courts of the United States to defeat such prosecution in a State court, other than such process as may be issued with respect to a defendant on trial under a criminal charge to protect his rights as a defendant under the Constitution of the United States.'

"SEC. 7. Section 49 is amended by inserting after the word 'imposed,' in the first sentence, the following: 'except where the separate offenses growing out of the same state of facts are united in separate counts the penalty imposed shall be the same as though there were only one offense charged.'

"SEC. 8. Section 58 is amended by striking out the words 'one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol' and the words 'one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume' wherever they occur, and inserting in lieu thereof the words '2¾ per cent of alcohol by weight.'

"SEC. 9. Section 61 is amended by substituting for the words 'Commissioner of Internal Revenue' the words 'Commissioner of Prohibition.'

"SEC. 10. If any provision of this act shall be held invalid it shall not be construed to invalidate other provisions of this act."

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the bill for the modification of the Volstead Act which I have introduced opens the way for a sane consideration of national prohibition. This bill makes possible the adoption by the respective States of the most desirable system operating in the Provinces of Canada and elsewhere where prohibition has been repudiated. It is in substantial compliance with the will of the people as expressed in the States which have held referendums favorable to the modification of the Volstead Act.

This bill abandons the theory that the Federal Government shall supervise and enforce mere police regulations relating to local affairs. The bill therefore deals with the prohibition question in relation to interstate or foreign commerce. The eighteenth amendment prohibits only the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. Therefore many sections of the Volstead Act are repealed or rewritten, with the view of limiting the power of the Federal Government to the regulation of intoxicating liquors in interstate or foreign commerce.

"Liquor," or the phrase "intoxicating liquor," is construed to mean liquors "which are fit for beverage purposes and which, when moderately used, are in fact intoxicating and which contain 2¾ per cent or more of alcohol by weight."

Since it is proposed by this bill that the Federal Government shall enter the field in the regulation of interstate commerce with respect to this question, exclusive of the States, it is provided that no State shall pass any law to restrict, limit, or enlarge the provisions of this proposed law relating to (a) "the manufacture for transportation, sale for transportation, or transportation of liquor for beverage purposes in interstate or foreign commerce"; (b) "or relating to the articles or liquor exempt under its provisions"; (c) "or in relation to the manufacture, use, possession, sale, purchase, transportation, distribution, or prescribing of medicinal liquor or wines for sacramental or religious purposes."

This provision is in harmony with many other laws enacted by Congress in regulating commerce among the several States, and when the Federal Government enters that field it usually enters it exclusive of the jurisdiction of the States. The same harmonious provision and procedure in relation to the regulation of interstate commerce with respect to many other questions is carried over into this bill providing for the regulation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in interstate or foreign commerce. Since liquor is recognized as a medicine, if it is good medicine in one State it is good in all States, and if the sacrament of wine is good in one State it is good in all States. The citizens of each State should be protected against prohibitive legislation in all States respecting medicinal liquor or sacramental wines, for even a sick person may travel from one State to another, and a religious person may need his sacramental wine as much in one State as in another.

The bill fixes a single standard respecting the issuing of prescriptions for liquor for medicinal purposes, and simplifies and standardizes permits for the use of wine for sacramental purposes or religious rites. A physician holding a permit may prescribe liquor for medicinal purposes for use anywhere, and prescriptions are limited for 1 pint of spirituous liquor, a quart of vinous liquor, or 4 quarts of malt liquor, to be taken internally, within any period of 10 days, unless two physicians, duly licensed, shall certify that a greater quantity is necessary for use by the same person. Only licensed pharmacists may dispense such medicinal liquors.

The manufacture for transportation, sale for transportation, or transportation, in interstate or foreign commerce of any liquor containing alcohol in any degree and which contains poison, are prohibited unless there is printed, in English, in plain and distinct type, in red, on the label upon the container the word "Poison." Any person violating that provision is subjected to a fine or imprisonment, and if death should occur in the use of any such liquor which is not properly labeled, then the person selling or delivering the liquor shall be guilty of a homicide and punished by imprisonment not less than one year nor more than three years.

Section 45 of the present prohibition law is amended by providing that all the Federal officers and persons named in the section shall be subject to prosecution in State courts for violation of any laws of a State, and in such prosecution there can be no transfer of a case from the State court to a Federal court, except that a process may be issued from a Federal court to protect the rights of the accused under the Constitution of the United States. This provision will make it possible for the State to prosecute and punish Federal prohibition agents when they commit an unlawful assault or murder in the enforcement of the law.

Section 49 of the prohibition act is amended providing that where separate offenses growing out of the same state of facts are united in separate counts, the penalty imposed for the violation of the law shall be the same as though there were only one offense charged. This provision is simply in harmony with what should be the policy in criminal prosecutions, whether under the prohibition law or other laws.

There are a few other minor amendments to the present Volstead Act to make it harmonize with the provisions of this bill.

It must be recognized and admitted that in the modification of the Volstead Act there can be no modification except within the terms of the eighteenth amendment. This bill is not repugnant to the eighteenth amendment. It comes within its terms. It restricts the Federal Government in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment to the regulation of the liquor question in interstate and foreign commerce, the only field in which the Federal Government can successfully operate.

Congress has not exercised its complete power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States."

Congress has surrendered to a large extent its power "to coin money," and in effect has surrendered to the Federal reserve system, a private undertaking, the power to issue money.

Congress has not exercised its full power in the establishment of post roads.

Congress has not exercised its full power under the fourteenth amendment.

Congress has signally failed to exercise its power under the fifteenth amendment.

If this bill becomes law, Congress will have exercised its power under the eighteenth amendment more fully than it has exercised its power with respect to the subjects I have just mentioned.

Moreover, this bill recognizes the ninth and tenth amendments. I recall that the ninth amendment provides that "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." I emphasize the tenth amendment, which provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

This bill harmonizes and makes effective the three amendments to the Constitution—the ninth, the tenth, and the eighteenth.

If this bill becomes a law, what the States may do is reserved to them, subject to the limitations upon them fixed by the Constitution and the amendments thereto.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT LAW

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 196), which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service is hereby authorized to investigate the subject of civil-service retirement and the operation and administration of the law relating thereto, and particularly the civil-service retirement and disability fund, as respects its depletion and the accrued liability of the Government in connection therewith, the manner and method of the administration of the said law and fund, and to study the problems in connection therewith, and to report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it deems advisable.

The report of the committee shall be submitted to the Senate within 10 days after the meeting of Congress December next.

Resolved further, That the said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper, and to require the attendance of witnesses, by subpœna or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers, at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpœnas, and every person duly summoned before said committee or any subcommittee thereof who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law.

A subcommittee of the Committee on Civil Service, selected by said committee, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise all the powers and duties conferred upon said Committee on Civil Service.

The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman, and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BEAR RIVER MIGRATORY-BIRD REFUGE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3194) to establish the Bear River migratory-bird refuge, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to construct, at Bear River Bay and vicinity, Utah, such dikes, ditches, spillways, buildings, and improvements as may be necessary, in his judgment, for the establishment of a suitable refuge and feeding and breeding grounds for migratory wild fowl; also to acquire, by purchase, gift, or lease, water rights and privately owned lands, including the improvements thereon, deemed necessary by him for the purpose, or, in lieu of purchase, to compensate any owner for any damage sustained by reason of the submergence of his lands.

SEC. 2. That such lands, when acquired in accordance with the provisions of this act, together with such lands of the United States as may be designated for the purpose by proclamations or Executive orders of the President, shall constitute the Bear River migratory-bird refuge and shall be maintained as a refuge and breeding place for migratory birds included in the terms of the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded August 16, 1916.

SEC. 3. That no such area shall be acquired by the Secretary of Agriculture unless or until the Legislature of the State of Utah has consented to the acquisition of lands by the United States for use as a refuge for migratory wild fowl, and shall have provided for the use as a refuge for migratory wild fowl by the United States of any lands owned or controlled by the State in Bear River Bay, Utah, and vicinity, which the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary for such purpose, and which the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to accept on behalf of the United States; and, except in the case of a lease, no payment shall be made by the United States for any such area until title thereto is satisfactory to the Attorney General.

SEC. 4. That the existence of a right-of-way easement or other reservation or exception in respect of such area shall not be a bar to its acquisition (1) if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that any such reservation or exception will in no manner interfere with the use of the area for the purposes of this act, or (2) if in the deed or other conveyance it is stipulated that any reservation or exception in respect of such area, in favor of the person from whom the United States receives title, shall be subject to regulations prescribed under authority of this act.

SEC. 5. That no person shall take, injure, or disturb any bird, or nest or egg thereof, or injure or destroy any notice, signboard, fence, dike, ditch, dam, spillway, improvement, or other property of the United States on any area acquired or received under this act, or remove therefrom, or cut, burn, injure, or destroy any grass or other natural growth thereon, or enter, use, or occupy the refuge for any purpose, except in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That at no time shall less than 60 per cent of the total acreage of the said refuge be maintained as an inviolate sanctuary for such migratory birds.

SEC. 6. (a) Any employee of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act (1) shall have power, without warrant, to arrest any person committing in the presence of such employee a violation of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto, and to take such person immediately for examination or trial before an officer or court of competent jurisdiction, and (2) shall have power to execute any warrant or other process issued by an officer or court of competent jurisdiction to enforce the provisions of this act or regulations made pursuant thereto. Any judge of a court established under the laws of the United States, or any United States commissioner, may, within his respective jurisdiction, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause, issue warrants in all such cases.

(b) All birds or animals, or parts thereof, captured, injured, or killed, and all grass and other natural growths, and nests and eggs of birds removed contrary to the provisions of this act or any regulation made pursuant thereto, shall, when found by such employee or by any marshal or deputy marshal, be summarily seized by him, and upon conviction of the offender or upon judgment of a court of the United States that the same were captured, killed, taken, or removed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto, shall be forfeited to the United States and disposed of as directed by the court having jurisdiction.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make such expenditures for construction, equipment, maintenance, repairs, and improvements, including necessary investigations, and expenditures for personal services and office expenses at the seat of government and elsewhere, and to employ such means as may be necessary to execute the functions imposed upon him by this act and as may be provided for by Congress from time to time.

SEC. 8. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to effectuate the provisions of this act: Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 may be expended for the purchase of land, including improvements thereon.

SEC. 9. That any person who shall violate or fail to comply with any provision of or any regulation made pursuant to this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

SEC. 10. That as used in this act the term "person" includes an individual, partnership, association, or corporation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

Mr. DILL. What is the amendment?

Mr. KING. The amendment improves the bill materially. The bill as it passed the Senate, though it was introduced by me, had provisions in it that were not at all acceptable to me. The amendment of the House of Representatives strikes out, for instance, the provision with regard to fishing, because there will be no fishing in connection with this reserve, and relieves the Department of Commerce of the work which it would perform in that respect. The amendment also restricts the amount of land which possibly may be allocated for shooting purposes.

Mr. DILL. What is the restriction in reference to shooting grounds?

Mr. KING. There were no restrictions in the bill as originally passed.

Mr. McNARY. I understand the Senator to say that the amendment limits the area which may be used as shooting grounds?

Mr. KING. The area is limited; yes.

Mr. McNARY. Is it limited to 60 per cent of the area?

Mr. KING. It is limited to 40 per cent. That is the provision inserted by the House.

Mr. McNARY. Does the House amendment increase or diminish the amount of appropriation provided by the Senate?

Mr. KING. The appropriation is the same, but a provision is inserted that not more than $50,000 may be used for the acquisition of land.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the amendment of the House, but I dislike to have a migratory-bird reservation purchased with any provision that permits public shooting grounds on it.

Mr. KING. So do I. If the Senator desires that the bill may go over, we can look into that feature.

Mr. DILL. I will not ask that that course shall be pursued.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the House.

With the question pending on agreeing to the amendment of the House, Mr. HEFLIN resumed and concluded his speech, which is here published entire.

After the conclusion of Mr. HEFLIN's speech—

The amendment of the House was agreed to.

DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDACY

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I send to the clerk's desk an editorial and ask to have read those portions which I have marked.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Thursday, April 12, 1928]

GOVERNOR SMITH'S FOOL FRIENDS

* * * * * * *

Nothing is to be gained by such statements as those of Morris S. Tremaine, State comptroller, who thought a visit to Virginia the opportune moment to threaten the South with a Northern Democratic bolt in the event of Governor Smith's defeat. "If the South does not rally to Governor Smith's support," said Mr. Tremaine in Norfolk, "knowing him to be the only Democrat in America who can win the Presidency, then the North will never forgive it. If the South rejects Governor Smith we of the North will believe that it was done because of his religious belief only." Mr. Tremaine added to this statement the threat that if the South does not support Governor Smith or openly deserts him new Congressmen will not vote for southern expenditures, because they will consider such action a slap in the face worthy of retaliation.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask the clerk to read another statement, the portions marked in ink, from the New York Times.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York Times, April 7, 1928]

WOONSOCKET GROUP IS EXCOMMUNICATED—ROME CONDEMNS NEWSPAPER AND RHODE ISLAND FRENCH CANADIANS WHO SUED BISHOP—FRIENDS OF ISRAEL BANNED—ASSOCIATION IS DECLARED TO HAVE ACTED CONTRARY TO CHURCH'S TEACHING—D'ANNUNZIO PLAYS SCORED

(Wireless to the New York Times)

ROME, April 7.—Severe measures taken by the Sacred Congregation of the council against a group of French-Canadian Catholics in the diocese of Providence, declared guilty of acts of insubordination to the diocesan authority, are announced to-night by the Osservatore Romano, official Vatican organ.

All Catholics who sued their bishop, Mgr. William A. Hickey, before the civil court are placed under excommunication, and the newspaper La Sentinelle, printed at Woonsocket, which is declared to "have supported the scandalous movement," is ordered to cease publication and all Catholics are forbidden to read it. The list of persons excommunicated is headed by Elphege J. Daignault, editor of La Sentinelle.

* * * * * * *

Following a controversy with supreme officers of the Union of St. Jean Baptiste of America, the editor opened an attack on the administration of Catholic Church affairs in Rhode Island, bitterly assailing Bishop Hickey and his supporters among the clergy in the matter of alleged utilization of parish funds for the construction of diocesan high schools.

A year ago Daignault and 63 others, 2 of whom are now dead, signed papers bringing suit against 12 parish corporations in the Providence diocese, with the object of obtaining an accounting of parish funds and seeking the return of money said to have been used in the building of schools.

A hearing was held in the equity session of the superior court at Providence and the judge sustained some and overruled others of the demurrers. The group amended its bills of complaint, and after a hearing the judge ruled that no violation of the statutes establishing the Roman Catholic Church in Rhode Island had been shown, and ordered the suits thrown out.

Daignault served notice of appeal to the State supreme court, and a few weeks ago arguments on it were made, but the decision was reserved and has not been made known yet.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, some weeks ago the Irish World, a Roman Catholic newspaper, threatened the Democratic Party with dire disaster if it should fail to nominate Governor Smith, of New York, for the high office of President of the United States. That newspaper served notice upon the Democratic Party that if it failed to nominate Governor Smith the Catholics would bolt the ticket, that they would not support the Democratic ticket to be nominated at Houston. This is an unbecoming threat and an un-American act. It violates every principle of American tolerance. It is in keeping, however, with the record of the Roman Catholic political machine regarding the National Democratic ticket. They bolted the Democratic ticket in 1916 because President Wilson refused to go to war with Mexico on behalf of the Catholic Church; they bolted the Democratic ticket in 1920, and in 1924 they bolted the Democratic ticket again. They have bolted the last three National Democratic tickets. They are really not entitled to participate in a Democratic primary or convention or to have one of their number run as a candidate on the regular Democratic ticket.

They talk of intolerance. Mr. President, every time a red-blooded American calls attention to the importance of preserving in their integrity the free institutions of America, not only do these Catholic periodicals assail him but they induce innocent and ignorant Protestants to do likewise.

Not long ago when I stood on this floor as an American Senator and exposed a Catholic conspiracy to destroy me politically because I had dared to oppose the Roman Catholic program for war with Mexico, the chairman of a Democratic club, so called, of Boston wired to the minority leader in this Chamber to have me read out of the Democratic Party. Talk about intolerance and bigotry! There it is in its most contemptible and asinine form.

They did not stop with that. Thirteen Roman Catholic members of the Legislature of Massachusetts wired to the governor of my State and requested him to have the Legislature of Alabama convened in extraordinary session to read me out of the Democratic Party because I had called attention to the pernicious, obnoxious, dangerous, and insidious activities of the Roman Catholic political machine. And now comes one of Governor Smith's cabinet members, one of his official family in the State of New York, and threatens to punish the Democratic South for daring to support whom she chooses for the nomination for President of the United States. I spurn these contemptible tactics of Tammany, these miserable threats from the Roman Catholic political machine.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. I rise to a point of order. As I understand it, during the morning hour debate is limited to five minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. It is not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not in connection with discussion on a conference report.

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand, a conference report is not before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair meant to say on a motion to concur in the House amendment to a Senate bill.

The five-minute rule only applies when bills are being considered on the calendar in the morning hour. Debate is unlimited on an amendment to a House bill.

Mr. CURTIS. In the morning hour?

Mr. HEFLIN. At any time when such a question is being considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The five-minute rule applies when the Senate is considering bills on the calendar under Rule VIII. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Democratic Party is confronted with a strange—in fact, with an extraordinary—situation. A new order of politics is now before us. A member of the official family of this New York wet Tammanyite, constitution nullifier, and head of the Roman Catholic political machine in America, goes down into Virginia, the mother of Commonwealths, the great old State that has furnished so many able and illustrious Presidents of the United States, and serves notice on that great people that if the South does not bow down, truckle, crawl on her knees before Alfred Smith, the politically chosen and annointed of the Pope of Rome, the South is going to be punished by the Roman Catholics of the North. The sooner the stalwart Democracy asserts itself and repudiates such hideous and hateful outcroppings in her ranks the better it will be for all concerned. I defy this mouthpiece of Governor Smith to carry out his threat. He is not speaking for anybody except his own church members, and I do not think he can deliver some of them, for I believe there is going to be an awakening amongst the rank and file of the Catholics of America, because they realize that two standards are clashing in this country—the American standard and the Roman standard—and when they clash one of them has got to submit and go down, and it shall not be the American standard.

This intolerance and bigotry ought to be crushed out. The idea of a man who thinks he is big enough to run for the high office of President having one of his emissaries go down into the Southland, the section that furnished him who wrote the Declaration of Independence, the section that furnished him who sounded the keynote of liberty in the Colonies, the section that furnished that brave warrior who led the Continental Army and achieved American liberty, and the section that produced him who wrote the Constitution of the United States—the idea of having him go down into that State, the proud old Commonwealth of Virginia, God bless her, and tell that brave and chivalrous people, "If you southern people do not submit and fall in line with Al Smith, we will punish you. Through our Members of Congress, Roman Catholics, we will vote against measures that will benefit your people in the South."

Was there ever such an exhibition of mean and bitter intolerance? I have never seen it, Senators. What are we coming to? Are the Democrats ready to turn this American Government over to such a régime? Mr. President, somebody is going to have to do a lot of explaining to the people at home after certain predicted things are pulled off at Houston. They are claiming now that the State of Arkansas has gone for Smith through a delegation picked recently by a central committee in that State. I am going to say to you that the people of Arkansas, in my judgment, are against Smith nearly 10 to 1; and if, by any hook or crook, that delegation is ever delivered to Smith at Houston, there will be a warm reception awaiting them when they return to the indignant Democrats of Arkansas.

The Smith machine claims 17 out of 20 of her delegates are for Alfred Smith; if that is true, Arkansas, in my judgment, has been badly treated, because the people of that State are not for Governor Smith. If they had had a primary in that State I was going to enter as a candidate, but I have been deprived of that privilege because they have had no primary or convention. Arkansas is against Smith, as Alabama is against him; and yet they tell us that they are going to turn over Arkansas to him at the convention.

God help the Arkansas politicians who are in that deal, if such a thing is done. And now comes the startling statement that Oklahoma has been delivered to this man Smith, who is threatening the South through his henchmen, who is proposing to lash the South into submission to a political program that she spurns, threatening to punish her, to vote against meritorious measures that would bring benefit to her people, unless she bows the knee to the Roman Catholic, wet, nullifying Baal of Tammany Hall. Mr. President, thank God there is in the South spirit and courage and ability enough to care for her interests and protect and defend her honor always. She may be betrayed now and then in certain States, but she will punish the betrayers in the end.

Oklahoma: They say they have Governor Haskell on the delegation. He has lived in New York for years. I think he is a member of Tammany Hall. He has been in Mexico, and he has gone back down there on a visit, I understand, and has succeeded in getting on the delegation from Oklahoma, selected by a committee. The people had no chance to vote, no convention was held; it was a case of committee manipulation, and now they are claiming that Al Smith has Oklahoma. The rank and file of the Democrats of Oklahoma are overwhelmingly against Governor Smith.

Scandal lurks around Iowa, we are told. Meredith threatens dire things about the crookedness and corruption employed there by the Smith crowd. Do you want me to tell you what I think?

I think the Al Smith campaign fund is the largest and most corrupt that has ever been secretly used in a presidential race. They are slipping about quietly, noiselessly, putting out their campaign poison. They are employing secretive methods—

> Whose silent courtship wins securer joys,
> Taints by degrees, and ruins without noise.

That is what is going on.

Mr. STECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do.

Mr. STECK. The Senator spoke of claimed corruption in Iowa and immediately followed it by a statement with reference to a great amount of money or slush fund having been used. I hope he does not infer that the Democrats in Iowa have been influenced in the decisions they reached at their county conventions by any great slush fund spent in behalf of any candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not like the signs that I have seen. I have seen a lot of wolf signs over in that direction. My own opinion is that money was quietly used in Iowa, if the Senator wants to know my opinion, very secretively and insidiously used out there. I think it was used in Oklahoma, too. I think it has been used and it is being quietly used everywhere they leave their foot tracks in a campaign for the Presidency. I believe that.

Mr. STECK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a minute?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will yield for a minute, just for a statement. I do not want to yield for a speech.

Mr. STECK. I have no quarrel with the Senator for expressing his own convictions on any question. I do not want to raise any issue with the Senator; but I want to assure him, as a Democrat from Iowa, as one who has been in touch with the situation in Iowa but who has taken no active part on either side in Iowa, that money has not been spent in a secret way or in an open way or in any other way to any large extent on either side.

I will further say to the Senator, for the benefit of the Senator and of the Senate——

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator has said enough right now in my time.

Mr. STECK. I have not quite finished. If the Senator refuses to yield——

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator does not know what has occurred in Iowa. If he learns to say "Iowa" like I say it, then I will yield to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. STECK. If the Senator will permit an observation——

Mr. HEFLIN. No; the Senator draws out that "Iowa-h" too long. [Laughter.]

Mr. STECK. I was born in Iowa, if the Senator please. I learned to speak the name of Iowa when I was born. I know how it should be spoken.

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, the Senator did not learn it right.

Mr. STECK. It should be spoken "Iowah," and not "Ioway." There is no use of our quarreling about that, however, because that is something too small for us to quarrel about.

Mr. HEFLIN. What I am objecting to is that it takes up too much time the way the Senator says it.

Mr. STECK. As I understand, the Senator expects to take all the rest of the time up until 3 o'clock; so he should not object to my taking at least five minutes of it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can not yield to the Senator further, because he said that he did not think this fund was used.

Mr. STECK. I will say further that as far as my information goes I know that no slush fund was used in Iowa. As a Democrat of Iowa, I deny that any slush fund was used in behalf of Governor Smith or in behalf of Mr. Meredith to gain the delegation in Iowa. I have been in Iowa. I think I know the conditions in Iowa. I am not quarreling with the Senator. I am merely saying that his information probably is not as direct or as good as the information of a Democrat from Iowa who has taken no part on either side of the fight.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is at least improving on the pronunciation of "Iowa." [Laughter.]

Mr. STECK. May I say that the Senator has heard sung so much the old song which we sing, where we pronounce it "Ioway," that he thinks that is the correct way. [Laughter.] I suspect he has joined in singing the song many times, to the edification of the people generally, and to the glory of Iowa.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is so far away from Iowa that he does not know what happens day by day in Iowa [laughter]; but if the Senator keeps on defending Alfred E. Smith and the Tammany tactics, it will not be long until he can stay always in Iowa. [Laughter.]

Mr. STECK. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can not yield to the Senator any more now. The Senator does not know what is going on in Iowa. They would not tell the Senator that they were handing these packs of money around. They are too smooth. They can teach the world how to distribute corrupt campaign funds. I repeat that in my judgment nobody has appeared in a political arena in the United States who can do it so secretively and effectively as the Al Smith bunch are doing it now; and I want to call on the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to reintroduce his resolution for the investigation of presidential campaign funds, and let us call them down here, Democrats and Republicans alike.

I do not want any Democrat to buy this nomination. I do not want any Republican to use money to obtain the nomination or the election, either one of them. I want clean politics. The way to fight nasty, corrupt politics is in your party, and when you see the earmarks of corruption all around you cry out against it, and that is what I am undertaking to do.

I prefer to hear from Mr. Meredith, of Iowa. He is a man who is threatening to tell an interesting story about the Smith tactics in Iowa, and I want to hear him. The Senator from Iowa does not know what is going on out there. They would not tell him what is going on. He is here. He springs very quickly, though, to the defense of this program in Iowa. Now, he has made his little explanation; let that stand.

Mr. President, I want this Borah resolution reintroduced, and we will pass it in this body and call these people before us, and start with Mayor Walker, of New York City. He is a smooth Al Smith artist. He is the slickest eel in the pond. [Laughter.] Why, they are slipping into States whose Democrats are standing like Gibraltar against Smith, and yet they are picking up delegates for Smith in some of those States.

Senators, somebody is going to have to answer for these things. You give the people of Oklahoma a chance to vote at the polls and they will beat Al Smith for the nomination by a hundred thousand majority; and now they are saying they have got a hog-tied delegation down there that is for Smith!

They have got a delegation in Louisiana. The committee down there, I understand, appointed a delegation; and the son-in-law of Champ Clark, the old ex-Speaker who at one time obtained a majority of the votes for President in a convention, has been here and, I understand, trying to get an opportunity to have a vote by the Democrats of Louisiana. They want an opportunity to vote on the delegation that is to go to Houston. It is now being claimed that the Louisiana delegation is for Alfred Smith.

Mr. President, such un-Democratic tactics had better be abandoned at once. Of course, if they nominate Governor Smith, I know what is going to happen. He will be beaten by at least 10,000,000 votes. I do not believe that he can carry 10 States in the Union. Mr. President, the Al Smith threat to coerce and intimidate southern Democrats, and the bold and insulting threat to punish the South if she did not fall in line and support Smith for the nomination for President are resented and repudiated by every self-respecting Democrat in the South.

Mr. President, will tactics of that sort appeal to the great sober, thinking American people?

Now I come to the second phase of this subject.

In the New York Times of April 8 there appeared a most remarkable and astounding statement from the Vatican at Rome. It vitally concerns the liberty of the citizen and the freedom of the press in the United States and presents a sharp and vital conflict between two governments—the Government of the United States and the government of the Pope of Rome. It pointedly presents the question as to which one of them is in control in this country. Aye, which one of them is supreme in its authority in the United States?

The Constitution provides that no citizen can be deprived of his property without due process of law, and the legislatures of the States and the Congress of the United States have provided courts of justice where any citizen—Protestant, Jew, or Catholic—may go as an American citizen and have his cause adjudicated in the American way, in an American court of justice.

In Rhode Island some months ago it is claimed that a group of American citizens who were members of the Roman Catholic Church had contributed large sums of money to be used for a certain specific purpose. The amount, I understand, was more than a million dollars. The American citizens, French Canadians, who had been induced to contribute their money, were influenced to do so solely by the representations made to them when they made their contributions. So when they found, as I understand it, that the money had not been used for the purpose for which they had contributed it they felt that they had been misled, imposed upon, and deceived in the matter.

Then, as members of the Catholic Church, they sought an explanation from the priest and the bishop. And we are told that the explanation was refused and they were criticized and reprimanded for exercising their rights as American citizens.

Then, not being willing to have their property thus obtained from them and used as it had been used without their consent, they felt that they had not only been deceived, imposed upon, and mistreated, but that they had been unjustly and unlawfully deprived of their property.

So these citizens of Rhode Island, exercising their constitutional rights as citizens of a sovereign State and as American citizens, took the case into an American court and asked to have the case decided according to the truth, the rules of right, and the laws of justice. Instead of commending them for their willingness to have the matter fairly and lawfully determined by a court of justice in the United States, the Catholic authorities condemned and denounced them for exercising their rights as American citizens.

I understand that the ecclesiastical powers of the Catholic Church demanded that they submit their case to a Catholic "church court" and agree to be bound by it, but these American citizens decided to exercise their rights as American citizens and ask to have this big financial transaction determined by an American court of justice. And for daring to choose an American court rather than a Roman Catholic court, these American citizens have been denounced and repudiated by the highest authority in the Roman Catholic government.

But that is not all that has been done to them. We are told that the Catholic bishop, who refused to account to these Catholic members for the disposition of a million dollars or more that they had paid to him, arbitrarily took the case to the Pope of Rome and his college of cardinals. But the Rhode Island French-Canadian Catholic American citizens involved in the matter insisted on their rights as American citizens to have the matter decided in a court of justice in Rhode Island, in the United States. They were doing what they had a right to do as American citizens. They refused to put Rome first. Now, let us see what happened to them. Why, these citizens of the United States have been tried in a Roman Catholic ecclesiastical court in Italy, a foreign country, under the jurisdiction of the Pope of Rome, and without regard to their rights as American citizens, and while their case is still pending in the Supreme Court of Rhode Island; they have been denounced, repudiated, and excommunicated by the highest authority in the Catholic Church. The effort has been made not only to humiliate them and to hurt their standing in the American community in which they live, but to injure their business; to punish them financially here in the United States by an edict sent out by a Roman Catholic potentate in a foreign country.

Not only have they done that; they have sought to destroy the livelihood, the means of support of American citizens who have called upon the courts of their country to require other supposed-to-be-American citizens—Catholic priests and bishops—to come into court and account for the disposition of a million dollars or more handled by them. Was there anything wrong about that simple request?

But that is not all. One of these French-Canadian Catholic American citizens, Elphege J. Daignault, editor of a newspaper, the Sentinel, who took the side of the Catholic contributors of the million dollars to the Catholic bishop, and who demanded that an accounting be had and the truth told to them as to how and for what purpose the money was used—this man has not only been attacked and denounced by the Roman Catholic powers that be in Rome—he has been ordered by this foreign Roman authority to immediately stop the publication of his paper.

This man has done nothing to cause the United States Government to deny his paper the use of the United States mail. American citizens have not requested that he stop the publication of his paper. Then, what is this order from the government of the Pope of Rome regarding the business occupation of an American citizen but an inexcusable and indefensible interference with and usurpation of rights and powers that belong exclusively to the Government of the United States? God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform, and it may be that He has caused to come forth at this particular time this important revelation of the dangerous and deadly forces that are at work right here in the United States to destroy civil liberty and religious freedom in America.

But this Roman Catholic government did more to these American citizens in Rhode Island than I have told you. It undertook to disgrace them and destroy their business here, and then by solemn edict excommunicated them and consigned their souls to hell. All this because they dared as American citizens to assert their rights under the Constitution, and asked that their rights be determined in an American court of justice.

Again I ask you, which government is in authority here—the American Government or the Roman government?

And yet Governor Smith, aspiring to the highest office in the land, has not said a word of protest against this denial of American rights and liberties to American citizens. He should be the very first, when seeking to become the ruler of this great country, to denounce interference with the rights and liberties of American citizens by the Pope of Rome, or anyone else.

Mr. President, this is all I care to say this morning on this subject.

LAND BANKS AND FARM RELIEF

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have here some articles with reference to the Columbia Land Bank and also the Haugen bill.

In 1914, in a speech in my State, I said that the western Senators and Members of the National House of Representatives were not going to permit the United States Government to loan money to hold cotton until the markets opened and trade resumed its normal condition, as was being advocated by some, but, on the contrary, that they were going at some time to make a demand for a tax on cotton. That prediction came true here yesterday.

I also stated in that speech that the national currency laws would be used for the benefit of favorites and that these banks would loan money in their respective communities to their favorites and friends, and that they would prove to be a failure. I have also at different times stated that in my opinion the Federal land-bank system was a means for robbing the farmers of this country by holding out inducements that they were aiding them, when by excessive charges and excessive interest rates they would prove to be their worst enemy if they were not very careful as to who handled them.

In proof of these predictions I desire to cite the Columbia, S. C., bank condition and have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD articles which I hold in my hand from the Farm Journal of Philadelphia, Pa., and from extracts of the Good Business Magazine, entitled "The whisper of death," also extracts by George Martin, editor of Farm and Fireside; by Edwin S. Lott, of New York City; Senator W. F. GEORGE, of Georgia; and others, which I request be printed along with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from an article in the Farm Journal, Philadelphia, Pa.]

THE FEDERAL LAND BANKS IN HOBBLES

(The Federal farm-loan system could have done and could now do wonderful things for the farmers, if its management were more vigorous, broad-minded, and enterprising. The system suffers by too close association with the Treasury Department, and by too great subservience to the Treasury officials. Certainly the operation of the land banks show up very unfavorably, as compared with the swift and effective movements of other agencies.—Editor's note.)

FLUID FINANCE ESSENTIAL TO FARMER

Next to marketing the crops at a profit, the most pressing problem of the 6,500,000 farmers of the United States is whether enough farm-loan bonds can be sold on the investment market to meet the needs of farmers through the 12 farmer-owned Federal land banks.

Whereas the average bond offered on the market, taxable or otherwise, represents only 100 per cent security to the investor, farm-loan bonds represent 110 per cent. An additional 10 per cent liability is assumed on all mortgages issued through farmer-owned Federal land banks. In other words, the farmer borrower, through the national farm-loan association, agrees not only to repay 100 per cent on every dollar borrowed, but by assuming this 10 per cent liability agrees, in event of his neighbor borrower failing to pay up, that he will pay 10 cents on the dollar additional to repay the borrower's loan. Thus, without considering even the 10 per cent liability feature, the investor is given a gilt-edged security, but with it the investor has one of the best bonds available. Therefore no reasonable excuse could be given for failure to issue and dispose of sufficient bonds to meet normal annual loan needs of the farmers of this country.

WHY THE DISSATISFACTION WITH SYSTEM?

With this security to offer, and the 12 Federal farmer-owned land banks to offer it, why then does the system as a whole work so slowly, and in many cases so unsatisfactorily? It is no injustice to charge that it is exclusively the fault of the Federal Farm Loan Board itself.

Annual loan needs of American agriculture aggregate $300,000,000 to even meet normal replacement needs. About one-third this sum, and not to exceed $150,000,000, one-half annual need, has been the average offering of these bonds from institution of system to this date. But to meet the business needs, even more bonds than the $300,000,000 should be issued and sold. If this were done, and it has been demonstrated that it could be done, the farmer will be set free from the slavery of mortgage indebtedness, and it can not be accomplished in any other way.

Many of the Federal land banks are now refusing to accept applications for farm loans, because their allotment of funds from the sale of bonds has been more than consumed in paying long-pending applications for loans. The percentage of rejections is also very high. The majority of the banks are doing business on a restricted plan of loaning money only to a few farmers here and there.

THE TREASURY IS THE BOSS

On the whole, the close association of the farm-loan system with the Treasury Department at Washington has not been altogether a healthy one. There has been more than one occasion when the policy of the land banks has plainly been made inferior to and dependent on the general policies of the Secretary of the Treasury, where the banks would have acted very differently if independent. The farmer-owned land banks should not be made the unimportant tail of the Treasury kite.

The Treasury still holds about $1,000,000 of capital stock in land banks, assumed back in 1916 when the act was passed and the money advanced by the Government to start the system off. There is no longer necessity of Uncle Sam advancing this money to these banks, if they are of such progressive and live financial condition as their officers testify, and the Treasury should be repaid this advance at once, thus removing further reason for officials in the Treasury Department bossing the banking system. This million-and-odd-dollar advance might very well be put to better purposes than dominating the land banks.

Another curious and unhealthy situation arises because the Treasury not only controls the farm-loan bonds but is also collector of income taxes. It does not, therefore, advertise or permit others to advertise overly strong the great advantages of the bonds because of their tax-exempt feature. It is also well known that the present Secretary of the Treasury is not a friend of tax exemption, which may partially account for this lack of publicity.

Every line of advertising placed in behalf of these bonds must needs pass some political overlord in Washington, which is not good business. In other words, the Treasury does not dare to let investors know how much they can actually save by buying the farmer's bond, for fear some one will criticize it for urging people to put their money where it will help the farmer and save the investor some tax.

WHO SHOULD RUN THE LAND BANKS?

The final criticism of the present management of the farm-loan system is too important and far-reaching to be discussed in the limits of one article. It lies in the fact that whereas the original intention was to have the board of directors of each land bank consist of six men elected by the farmer owners and three named by the Farm Loan Board. Up to this time, the farmer stockholders have, practically speaking, had no representation.

This might not be bad if there was any prospect of putting the system into effect soon, as contemplated by the original act of 1916. The evidence shows, however, that the present farm loan board and the Treasury Department bureaucracy have no intention of ever letting go of their present absolute control, if they can help it. They are convinced that their management is the best possible, and are inclined to shudder at the terrible (?) disasters that would follow if the farmer-owned land banks were turned over to their rightful owners.

STOCKHOLDER MANAGEMENT IS SAFE

Now, as a matter of fact, all successful financial institutions are managed by the stockholding members and not by outside interests. Every successful cooperative institution in the United States is likewise managed by the stockholders, through a board of directors whom they elect. The cooperative, farmer-owned Federal land banks, being our first nation-wide cooperative enterprise of farmers and our greatest venture in farm finance, could and should be managed and controlled directly by those who own the capital stock and assume the 10 per cent liabilities to insure its safety and soundness—not by outside politicians.

This does not mean that the farmer himself must go down to the land bank and become a banker. In most cases he lacks the training; but he could and should designate efficient directors to perform this task for him, as do all other successful cooperative enterprises.

[Extract from article in Pennsylvania Farmer]

WHO SHALL RUN THE FEDERAL LAND BANKS

The American farmer borrowers of the Federal farm loan system have repaid to the Treasury all save less than a million dollars capital stock advanced to institute this system of credit. This should be repaid at once, as the financial schedule of the banks shows they have available funds with which to turn this money back into the Treasury and make it available for other causes, such as tax reduction. Thus, the farmer stockholders will not only own every dollar of capital stock of these 12 Federal land banks, but like stockholders of national banks, these farmer stockholders should shoulder all the liabilities in event of losses. They should enjoy full management of the land banks which they own.

TOO MUCH OUTSIDE DOMINATION

It is safe to say that the American farmer has had more than a plenty of outside domination in his business. His present ills may be traced to just such sources. The National Grange has time and again gone on record as opposed to State or Federal domination of strictly farm matters, and in favor of turning the farm loan system over to the rightful owners; the National Board of Farm Organizations, and the newer and larger organization of the American Farm Bureau Federation does not seem joyous over Government domination of the farmer's business in banking.

James R. Howard, first president of the American Farm Bureau Federation hit the nail on the head, from the farmer's standpoint, when he said:

"It is well to remember that in matters of business the State is less efficient than the individual. Men may create government, but governments can not make men.

"Personally, I approve that constructive radicalism which provokes serious thought. It spells success. I will go the limit regarding cooperative marketing and Government supervision of all public utilities. But I draw the line on an 'ism' that is destructive and not constructive, particularly if destructive of that greatest of all human agencies—personal initiative.

"I deplore the growing tendency on the part, not only of some farmers, but other men in high places to stress the functioning of Government too much, and of the individual too little."

Thus, Mr. Howard has given the radical element, who would have the Government run everything for the farmer, an answer that they will need to give considerable thought to in order to make a sensible answer. Every farmer who is sane (and most farmers are) remembers his experience in the past with political appointees, and will agree with Jim Howard in his straightforward answer to a modern idea prevailing in too many selfish camps.

LET THE TREASURY LET GO!

One of the main things certain radicals advance as a reason why the Government should continue to dominate the whole Federal farm loan system is that the Treasury still holds less than $1,000,000 worth of stock in the banks. If the reports of the Farm Loan Board are to be credited, this stock should really be held by the farm-loan associations, since the volume of business now on the books of each of the 12 banks surely does not merit the Federal Government longer holding any of the capital stock of any bank. Yet this reason is still given for the Treasury bossing the farmers' banks. However, if the Government is as hard up as Secretary Mellon would have us believe each time tax reduction is discussed, why does not this financier let go of that stock rather than tie this money up in the Government vaults? The Government under Mr. Mellon's administration has held as high as eleven billion dollars' worth of foreign government bonds, but Mr. Mellon did not recommend our Government taking over those governments until those larger loans were repaid. There is not a solitary reason why the same Treasury should longer hold a whip over the farmer-owned land bank system.

Therefore, why subsidize the farmers' banking system? His bonds are above par, his bank stock is a "good buy." Can any sound-minded man offer one solitary reason why he should be made the goat of political control simply because he has made good?

For 40 years previous to the passage of the farm loan act, in 1916, the American farmer had insisted that he be given a finance system his own, performing for his, the essential industry, precisely what other banking systems had failed to, namely, provide him with needed capital to develop and promote his industry. No one suggested that the farmer become a stockholder of a banking system, assume a liability, and then permit some outsider, with not 1 cent involved, and assuming no liability, operate the system. Even in Soviet Russia, so bold and radical a dream as that has not risen to the horizon to date. Yet in Washington we hear statesmen and politicians condemn Russia for doing less than they have done to our own farmers.

LEGALLY FORCED TO LIABILITY

Every farmer who has secured the benefits of the Federal farm loan system through any of the 12 land banks has been legally forced to subscribe to 5 per cent the amount of his loan as capital stock, which is invested as capital in the land bank by the national farm loan association of which he is a borrower. In order to give the bond upon his mortgage the best security in sight of the investor, and to safeguard the system, like national bank owners, this same farmer assumes a double liability of 10 per cent of the amount of his loan, or $100 per $1,000 borrowed.

Under these circumstances, the 12 Federal land banks, like the national banks, should immediately be turned over to the farmer owners. Would business stand for one moment for having the Government appoint the directors and officers of the national banks, subsidizing this great banking system of more than 7,000 banks as a political logrolling system as has been done with the 12 Federal land banks and more than 4,000 national farm loan associations? Neither should the American farmer have his dozen regional banks and associations, taken over by a super and vicious political organization, as is now the case.

[Extract from article in Farm Journal]

THROUGH THE FARMER HIMSELF

Shortly before his death, Theodore Roosevelt said: "The farm industry can not stop; the world is never more than a year from starvation; this Great War has immensely increased the cost of living without commensurately improving the condition of the men who produce the things on which we live. Our object must be to make capital available for farmers, and thereby put them more on an equality with other men engaged in business—to do this primarily through the farmer himself; for the welfare of the farmer is the concern of all of us."

This brings us to the biggest question now before the people: Shall the farmers themselves operate their own farm-loan system, or shall it be operated by politicians? The politicians now completely manage and dominate the system, though some luke-warm appointees are there to represent (?) farmers. Since these are in the minority, their advice and desires play a most inconspicuous part in the actual management of the system.

[Extract from article in American Thresherman, Madison, Wis.]

SHALL FARMERS OPERATE THE LAND BANKS?

The farmer owners of the more than 4,000 national farm-loan associations of the country are getting pretty weary of imitation cooperative land banks; they want something besides a dream with a night horse as the "morning-after" effect.

These same farmers have pretty good reason to be tired, too. They have not only advanced the unquestioned collateral security to permit the making of the loans through these banks to date, but they have subscribed to the capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks to the extent of 5 per cent of their loans, and have assumed also a 10 per cent liability to protect the system against the collection of payments on their neighbor's loan, as well. To do this, these farmers have been legally forced to assume liabilities in excess of $160,000,000, yet these banks are managed by politicians, while the farmers who subscribed the capitalization and assumed the liabilities can warm their shins at some other stove. The politicians completely dominate the 12 land banks.

These farmers, after having done this, discover that they have not one word to say about the administration or operation of their land banks. Let us contrast this situation against the man who owns but one share of local, national, or State bank stock. He receives one vote in the annual meeting at which directors are elected; he has one vote in determining the policy of the bank, as authorized at the stockholders' meetings. But a farmer stockholder in the Federal farm loan system might hold 100 shares in the bank, yet he could not peep. Congress simply hog-tied these farmers when they amended the original farm loan act and put the banks into the control of politicians.

Since organization of the system, in 1916, the farmers (for whom the banking system was intended) have had not one word to say about the way it should be operated, and they will not have until the system is turned over to them.

Would it be fair and just, sprinkled with ordinary horse sense, for the more than 7,000 national banks of the country to take orders only from one room down in Washington? How would business prosper under such a plan? About the same as it does in the farm loan field! And this has not been such a success that any sane business man will wish the Congress now in session to effect subsidized banking for business.

Then, why should the farmer owners of the Federal farm loan system be dominated by a small committee of commissioners at Washington, working through their political appointees in the banks throughout the country? Have our American farmers reached a stage where it becomes necessary to appoint guardians to transact their business for them? Is it a fact that these farmers are incompetent and unintelligent? Is "taxation without representation" still considered tyranny? If so, let the politicians out and put the farmer owners in.

THE WHISPER OF DEATH

There are times when silence is treason. Occasions come when the thing that every man of intelligence knows and whispers behind his hand to some one he can trust—but which he is afraid to speak aloud—must be shouted boldly from the housetops if the people are to be awakened to the danger that overshadows them.

Such a grim crisis did the Adams boys face at the Boston Tea Party, Patrick Henry in the Virginia Legislature, Nathan Hale at the hangman's noose. To-day wherever men foregather whose business it is to know about the current events of our Nation, they speak of a thing that threatens the very life of this Nation, if permitted—and yet the busy work-a-day people of America, intent on making a living, remain in fatal ignorance of impending peril. Such conduct might be defensible in a despotism but never in a democracy. It is the people—the intelligent people—who can and should save the cause and themselves. They can not be saved from above. Every battle for safety or right that is won in a democracy is a soldier's battle. But to win it the soldiers must know that it is to be fought.

This unspeakable thing which threatens the life of the Nation is a grand endeavor to put over one of the most socialistic and supersubsidized structures that has been presented to the Congress. Specifically, we refer to the McNary-Haugen bill, and all the little children of the same family, of which there are half a dozen hoping to get upon the statute books. Every radical is laboring night and day to put these across.

These men, and many who should be more intelligent than to join forces with them, frankly tell us that the 6,000,000 farmers in the United States can never be brought together through voluntary cooperation. Therefore to cure the farm ills they would pass a compulsory cooperative bill. This would put our Government into the marketing business. It would create the greatest bureaucratic machine that has to date been erected in Washington. It would destroy private initiative, hamstring private endeavor, and begin the end of private enterprise. The bill would injure legitimate cooperative marketing associations, and ruin foreign markets through systematic dumping of surpluses.

It would use the taxpayers' money to advance the cause of state socialism. It impudently flaunts the Constitution of the United States and lays the foundation for the socialization of all industry. There is nothing in communistic Russia that is more subversive of personal liberty or more destructive of the inherent right of a citizen to pursue a legitimate calling in a legitimate way.

This bill, we are told, is likely to pass the Congress. Why? Because of the cowardice of the politicians. Many Representatives have not awakened to the real situation; they have been wasting their time. Others believe it is unsound and can not pass; others rest on their oars. Congress is now run by blocs and cliques. They intend to get this piece of socialism across. They don't give a rap about the Constitution. They are going to "pass the buck" to the President, and as this is a presidential year with an election just ahead, they will dare him to veto the thing. And the chances are that he will not dare veto it. It is far easier to "pass the buck" to the Supreme Court than to lose a few votes.

Knowing that the country is opposed to price fixing, the bill was written with the intention of camouflaging its price-fixing feature. The price to be fixed, under the bill, is a "ratio" price, and this ratio will be maintained by taking the surplus on the market and disposing of it in foreign countries on a world level. The scheme is then to increase the tariff on wheat, for example, 40 or 50 cents a bushel, so as to raise the price on all wheat consumed in the United States. Another try at lifting ourselves by the bootstraps, and to see prosperity pass out the door. If the supersocialistic program could increase the level of farm prices, it would increase production, defeating its own object.

The very first thing that would be done would be to abolish future trading, because future trading can not exist under a fixed price, whether that price be a "ratio" price or any other arbitrary price. In order to maintain a "ratio" price the Government would need to have a place to store the grain. This means getting the Government into the elevator business.

The authors of this bill did not have the courage to prepare a regular price-fixing bill, but since they get the same result by merely walking around the barn, what is the difference to them? They will gladly put the Government into private business by the back-door route. They would try to make the dose palatable to the consumer by telling him that the farmer "must stand the loss on the grain that is sold for export."

The bill gives the Government control over grains, cotton, cattle, sheep, swine, wool, etc. A "ratio" price on all such farm products may be fixed by the President when it is shown that an "emergency exists."

The bill puts the Government into business. It gets behind the scheme and finances it with a gigantic revolving fund, and it compels every farmer to join! It is in reality a great Government pool financed with the taxpayers' money.

The whisper of death! If the Government can appropriate money to finance farmers, why not labor unions, automobile manufacturers, coal dealers, barbers, one-legged men—anyone? What is the difference? Where will it stop? Present-day communism in Russia goes no further than this! Lenine in his heyday had only his red army; this bill would give the bureaucrats the law!

How long can private initiative survive under a Government that appropriates millions of dollars of tax-exempt money to go into business in competition with its own citizens? How long can individual Americans compete with their Government? Remember the age-old story of the camel that put its head into the tent! It didn't take long until the body followed and the tent fell! In Russia the cry raised by the communists was: "All power to the Soviets." In the United States the slogan now is, "All power to Congress and the bureaus." It means the same thing. We are headed the way of Russia unless liberty-loving men awaken and act.

Here is your opportunity to do something for the Government that has—as a Republic, not as a Soviet—stood the test of time and trial. How? Let Washington know that you are opposed to the cure-alls proposed which continue to keep the Government in business, and to put it into new and larger enterprises, to compete with American business houses "back home." This is done by erecting hamstringing bureaus to dominate individual freedom and personal liberty. Americans! This is a call to arms. You alone must decide and decide now. Stay the hand of death!

FARM LOAN BOARD GIVES ILLUSTRATION

Business men may take a look at the functions of the Federal farm-loan system if they doubt what the proposed administrating farm-loan board which this latest law would erect if they wish to have a pretty fair idea of how the Government functions in business. And by that illustration, no law should be permitted to pass which calls for a similar political administration of strictly private business.

[Extract from article in Farm and Fireside, New York City]

IT CAN'T BE DONE THAT WAY

By George Martin, editor Farm and Fireside

It is not the function of government to transact the business of the people. It would be inadvisable to have it do so even if it could. They have been trying that in Russia and you see with what results.

The function of government is to clear the channels of commerce, trade, industry, and agriculture so that the people can properly transact their own business; and it is the further function of government to protect the people in the right and privilege of transacting their own business. This leaves a man's success or failure up to himself, which is as it should be.

And no matter how poorly we do it ourselves, the business of the country would be transacted even more poorly by the Government.

[Extract from pamphlet written by Edson S. Lott, New York City]

STOP THE HOLE IN THE DIKE—"THE TOUCH OF GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS IS THE TOUCH OF DEATH"

While all are familiar with the story of how Hans, the little Dutch boy, saved the people of his country from being drowned, please permit me to repeat it.

Hans and his little brother were playing on that great dike which keeps the sea from overflowing Holland. He saw a tiny hole in the dike, only a little thing, yet large enough to let through a wee bit of water.

The leak appeared to Hans to grow larger as he watched it. All his young life he had heard of the dike; how it had been built by the painstaking and long-continued industry of many workers; how useful it was to keep the sea from rushing in and drowning everybody; why it was necessary constantly to watch and repair it; and that a little hole in it, if not immediately stopped, might soon grow so large that it could not be stopped at all.

Hans immediately thrust a finger in the hole and commanded his brother to run and tell their father there was a hole in the dike and to hurry to fix it.

The father quickly grasped a shovel and ran to Hans, calling to others as he ran: "There's a hole in the dike; come along with shovels!"

When they came to Hans he was faint with fright and fatigue, but the dike was repaired, the people were saved, and Hans was a hero.

KEEP THE GOVERNMENT OUT OF BUSINESS

The present greatness and power of the United States of America are due to the refusal of the Government in the past to hold in check the initiative, the enterprise, the ambition, and the thrift of its individual citizens.

Our Government has prospered because its individual citizens have prospered. They have prospered because the Government has protected them in their rights to the fruits of their industry and enterprise.

"In all its history our Government has trodden down no man's liberty," said Daniel Webster in the Senate of the United States on March 7, 1850.

Recently the New York Times said: "Property and profits are the mainspring of human activities."

This is an individualistic country, thank God. It is a country where superior intelligence along any line of human endeavor, the knowledge properly to apply it, the ambition to make use of it, and sufficient health and grit to keep everlastingly at it always win individual fame or fortune—frequently both. This very fact is hateful to those socialists and communists who would jackplane all our citizens down to a common level.

There are many brands and breeds of socialists and communists. No one, not even one of themselves, seems to understand the superfine distinctions which mark the difference between them. But there is a common ground for all of them. They all hate, loathe, and spit upon the "capitalistic system." Even the capitalists among them—and there are some—seem to share these feelings and appear to long for the day when they shall divide their all with their provident, thriftless, and worthless neighbors, so that all may be in the same boat.

The opportunity for personal gain through individual effort has developed in this country a citizenship which has, in turn, made ours the most free and the most powerful among the nations—a country which our communistic friends are loathe to leave, even when imperatively invited to do so by our Government. Yet of late there has been a tendency on the part of our lawmakers to curtail individual opportunity by placing our Government in competition with its citizens, or by actually taking away altogether such opportunity in certain enterprises. This is clearly socialistic to the extent of removing the reward which belongs to individual effort.

SUPERPOLITICAL BANKING SYSTEMS

From some quarters there now come demands that the Government engage in the banking business, in the grain-elevator business, in the farm-loan business, in the building business, in insurance, and other businesses—even in the newspaper business (but always in some other fellow's business).

You all know what North Dakota has done—or tried and failed to do.

Such laws get on our statute books because the plea is made that the State can carry on the business at less cost and can give better service than private companies. That assumes what we all know to be untrue—that there is a halo surrounding an individual working for the Government which causes him to do better work for less money than if he were working for a private corporation.

States force all citizens to wear enough clothing to be decent. Is this a good reason why the State should furnish clothing at cost?

States force parents to provide their children with necessary medical attention. Is this a good reason why the State should furnish doctors and medicines at cost?

States force families to bury their dead. Is this a good reason why the States should furnish undertakers and burial places at cost?

States force parents to feed their helpless children. Is this a good reason why the State should run provision stores of the country, or the farmers, or the flour mills?

States force all property owners so to maintain their properties that the public will not be injured by them; and property owners are legally obliged to pay damages to all those who are injured through the improper maintenance of their properties. Should the State, therefore, be asked to furnish at cost the material necessary to make all properties safe?

A FAIR FIELD AND NO FAVOR

Perhaps you agree that the State should operate provision stores, drug stores, undertaking establishments, cemeteries, farms, flour mills, building-material establishments, grain elevators, insurance companies, farm-loan banking systems, etc.

You object to individualistic monopoly; then please do not vote for Government monopoly. What is the matter with "A fair field and no favor; an equal opportunity for all"?

This is what Arthur I. Vorys, of Ohio, says:

"Jealousy, envy, and spite against profitable enterprises, so easily aroused in human nature, are largely involved in such propaganda. When Mr. Duffy says 'It is to prevent individuals or corporations from making profits out of the misfortunes of the people,' when he advises employers that if they 'have five or ten million dollars to spare, let them put it into the pay envelopes of their employees instead of into the coffers of the insurance companies'—then is when he invokes the spirit that puts State operation across.

"Suppose some one, professing to represent the 'plain people,' assembled the figures showing what a sewing machine costs for labor and material, and then the figures showing what the purchaser pays for the machine. If the campaign were well organized and aimed only against sewing machines, and the figures well advertised, you know it would be easy to get the State to engage in the business of making sewing machines 'at cost.' It would not be well for anyone engaged in such propaganda to start against more than one enterprise. Such things succeed because none of us takes any particular interest in legislation not aimed at our own affairs. The sewing-machine manufacturers and their agents would find little sympathy and no help from other people; they would be denounced by the propagandists.

"Can sensible people in America be made to realize that the function of the Government is to regulate and never to engage in business, and that whenever it attempts to engage in business it violates a vital, fundamental principle of this Republic?"

FREE HANDS OF HONEST BUSINESS

The late former Senator Beveridge, of Indiana, in an article in the New York Times, indorses this movement. He wrote:

"Free the hands of honest business. Open the doors of honest trade. Lift from the heart of commerce the timidity that makes it weak and spasmodic."

He also spoke of "the legislative hand on the industrial and business activities of the American people."

The New York Sun says:

"The touch of the Government in business is the touch of death."

It is a common danger.

The spirit of communism is in the air.

We hear it boldly proclaimed from pulpit and platform.

We feel its subtle influence working in the factory and in the college—"the Government out to do this or do that."

We are coming to a realization that it is a menace to our form of government.

State operation of railroads has been avoided. But State operation of the great farm-loan banking system has not—and see the results.

Yes; State operation of banks is still going on—or going under.

COMMUNISTIC COMMON ENEMY

Is it not time that Americans, who believe that the only business of Government is to govern, wake up, get together, and present a united front against this common enemy?

I have said that all their rational arguments have been refuted by reason and disproved by experience. Are their arguments, then, abandoned? Certainly not.

In Russia communism has failed disastrously in practice.

And why has it failed?

Listen to what was said by Capt. Hugh S. Martin, of the American Army Intelligence Secret Service, speaking before the Merchants' Association of New York, concerning his four years' experience in Russia. "You will be told that all Russia is dying because of the blockade. I tell you that Russia is dying to-day and industry is going because Communism and Bolshevism have destroyed individual initiative and human ambition. If the leaders want to give in, as some would have us believe, they have but one step to take—the reestablishment of private property to legal owners. That will bring Russia back. Nothing else will."

Yet the communists here in America still keep up their confident assertions that communism will certainly produce the "perfect state."

In Germany the Government is seeking to bring about private operation of its Government-owned railroads, to secure economy and efficiency; but in this country the State socialists still cry for more inefficiency and indifference which characterizes the management by politicians of private property.

THE GREED FOR THE SPOILS

Manifestly, these examples show that adverse experience does not check the movement for State exploitation, and that its inspiration in envy of the success of private business—the compelling urge of the State socialists—and greed for spoils that so frequently accompany governmental operations.

The reasons are supplemented by the ignorance of some and the indifference of many.

The state socialist has started; he intends to end with state ownership of all business, all commerce, and all industry.

So much for the tactics employed in the campaigns. They have been insidious and effective. Familiarize yourself with them; for, whatsoever your particular business may be, in time it will be subjected to similar attacks, unless we unite and prevent the spread of the evil.

REMEMBER THE HOLE IN THE DIKE

Do not forget the hole in the dike. Socialistic is the hole in the great dike which protects individual freedom, individual initiative, and individual responsibility from the mad waters of socialism.

Finally, who are the enemies? Who are the people who have been fermenting, guiding, and aiding this attack upon private enterprise?

All communists and socialists, of course.

All spoilsmen, job hunters, and social parasites, naturally.

All professional reformers and political demagogues looking for a campaign battle cry unreservedly.

Political pie makers, pie cutters, and pie eaters—all of them.

A lot of honest folks also.

And bureaucrats generally.

When the evil day comes upon them the supporters of state interference with business will as foolishly cry for mercy as did the young man of whom we have heard, who killed his father and mother with an ax, and who pleaded with the judge, after he had been convicted of murder, to be merciful because he was an orphan.

When the state begins to take over our property, our business, we may all become in time slaves of a political power whose evolution may lead to the destruction of civilized society.

America has been made great through individualism, has more to offer the American people in point of wealth production and fair distribution than has socialism.

The incentive has been the opportunity for personal gain.

State monopoly would kill private initiative and make us all equal pawns in a socialistic mass.

If we, free-born American citizens, are not alert to our common danger, what right have we to expect that a kind Providence will keep us safe from the blighting peril of state monopoly?

I ask those who believe that the only business of the Government is to govern not to forget the little Dutch boy and the little hole in the dike which protected an industrious and deserving people from swift and certain death—that great dike which for long years has protected American individualism. If we permit that hole to grow larger it will, in time, perhaps within a short time, grow large enough to let through sufficient water to inundate all private enterprise; for if a flood tide breaks through, our Government will conduct all business—none can escape.

I ask you to help keep in good repair the dike; that dike builded and preserved by the hands and lives of staunch Americans since the writing of the Declaration of Independence; that dike which protects individual freedom, individual initiative, and individual responsibility from the mad waters of socialism.

[Extract from Efficiency Magazine]

LET PAPA DO IT FOR YOU

The little acorn of the old proverb, that into a mighty oak grew, is a piker at sprouting compared to a Government bureau or department. There's a chance the acorn may fall on fertile ground. But a Government bureau, once established, no matter how small the start, never. They always live and, gosh! How they grow!

Let Congress just vote the creation of an innocent little bureau to do something for the folks, and the one office, one chief, and one stenographer, in very few years will have expanded into a full-fledged department, clamoring for more office space and doing things for the folks, or to them, that weren't dreamed of when first the law was passed.

Our legislators first frame laws to meet the desires of one organized minority, and then they frame more laws to meet the desires of another organized minority, after which they devote themselves busily to framing still more laws to appease the ear-splitting howls of every other organized minority that has a howl in its system.

Such a state of affairs is, in a way, an embryonic form of the Bolshevik uprising in Russia. The Bolsheviks were, and are, a very small but very well-organized minority. They knew exactly what they wanted, and they knew exactly where they proposed to apply the ax in order to get it. Their opponents lacked leadership, vision, and backbone. They knew they were going to be struck, but they never made up their minds which way to dodge or how to return the initial blow with a violent and effective wallop. As a result, 150,000,000 people have been overwhelmed and wrecked by an aggressive minority of little more than half a million Bolsheviks.

The student of political science learns at an early date that bureaucracy is "the only form of government for which the philosopher can find no defense," and that "republicanism and bureaucracy are incompatible existencies."

In order that there may be no mistake as to the exact nature of bureaucracy, its definition in a standard work of reference is: "Government by bureaus; specifically, excessive multiplication of, and concentration of power in, administrative bureaus. The principle of bureaucracy tends to official interference in many of the properly private affairs of life, and to the inefficient and obstructive performance of duty through minute subdivision of functions, inflexible formality, and pride of place."

The founders of this country had certain definite ideas, prominent among which was the idea that God helps him who helps himself. The United States did not reach its present commanding position because its early settlers and lawmakers were led tenderly over to this country and catered to by a lot of paid agents, pushed into soft jobs, and wrapped up in cotton wool when they pounded their fingers or were dissatisfied with their wages. They fought their way over here, and they fought to hold their homes when they got here. Life in America was a life of fierce competition—of competition with nature and of competition with other men.

The State was able to meet its difficulties without bursting into tears and taking its bruises to the Great White Father at Washington to be kissed. Only the Indian was so incompetent in the gentle art of self-rule that he had to be closely supervised by the Federal Government; and the Indian isn't lasting well.

Things are different nowadays. Of late years the United States, lacking the vision and the common sense to see the inevitable results of such folly, has admitted the cheapest of Europe's immigrants by the million. Because of their training, their environment, and their heredity the bulk of these people have been incapable of grasping our principles of government.

Having absorbed a sufficient amount of cheap foreign thought, these enthusiastic people imbue other people with their enthusiasms and form organized minorities, which make concerted and often successful drives on Congress to have their fads and visions made into laws.

The goal toward which these people are working is a paternalistic, socialistic, communistic United States of America, in which there shall be no more government by the people through wise leaders selected by them, as provided by the Constitution, but a government by laws through an enormous number of bureaus centralized in the Capital, as practiced in Soviet Russia.

There are more than 250 different commissions and bureaus of the Federal Government already in existence. "They comprehend every sort of human activity in art, science, and administrative power, including forestry, agriculture, horticulture, mechanics, chemistry, biology, the whole field of medicine, including investigations both in human and animal diseases. In fact, there is nothing in the heavens above, the earth beneath, or the water under the earth that is not comprehended in the activities of some Government agency. If some midnight dyspeptic idealist as he lies awake thinks he has discovered some new idealistic good which he deems to be for the betterment of mankind, he immediately proceeds to draft a bill creating a new bureau under the Federal Government for the purpose of carrying his newly discovered idea into effect."

It is inevitable that the extension of bureaucratic government will destroy the energies and therefore the liberties of the people. It is inevitable that the more bureaucratic government is extended the less community and State government will be left.

It is inevitable that the extension of national power will call for more and more taxation to support the increased number of departments and bureaus with their inevitable increase of men and women upon the pay rolls. It is inevitable that the more the Government taxes the people the less the people can tax themselves for State and community purposes. It is inevitable that the more money the Government gets from taxation the less the States can get. The fuller the National Treasury the more empty the State treasury, until all energies of government will be nationalized and the States will be too poor to pay for any of their own. When that time comes, then will come revolution as the only escape from the tyranny of Congress, just as it was the only remedy in 1776 against the tyranny of a king. Either this or national death through a slavish and decadent citizenship.

That is one reason why taxes are high and why to-day, despite all the drive for economy and retrenchment, there are 65,730 persons holding down Government jobs in Washington and 475,193 outside of Washington. These figures, large as they are, do not even include the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps. Nor do they include the thousand-odd employees that work for Congress itself, as distinct from the regular Government civil list.

The huge governmental establishment of to-day, which costs so much to maintain that taxpayers wonder whether Government was created to serve them or they to work for it, is the result of many such small acorn starts. And even now, despite the clamor for retrenchment, economy, and less government, if possible, more such bureau acorns are being sown than in any other period in national history. The epidemic of having the Government do everything is running wild.

There is always some demand for the bureau or department to get it started. But once started they never stop.

The entire Government at Washington is just a repetition of such small starts, grown and swollen into expensive governmental functions, once started and never given up. It is natural government must grow as the country grows. That goes without saying.

But that isn't the chief source of expansion of the governmental machine. It's the continuous, never ending, expansion of what the bureau or department is doing that makes Government grow at a constantly accelerating pace.

The examples can be multiplied simply by narrating the growth of any Government bureau. The Bureau of Efficiency might be mentioned. Getting more efficiency in the Government is a continuous source of discussion by the lawmakers. It was a hobby of President Taft. Finally there was established by law, in 1916, a regular Bureau of Efficiency to investigate Government business methods, the personnel problem, and the duplication of work in Government departments. It started off with a modest $40,000 a year. Without any suggestion of criticism of the work being done by the Efficiency Bureau, it might be pointed out that it has been efficient also in another respect.

THE FARM LOAN BOARD

Then, we have the Federal Farm Loan Board, of the Treasury Department, which made a small start the same year—1916—and which now has a nice large staff, and which is unique in one fact. Not only does this bureau draw a handsome sum out of the Federal Treasury each year but it also has been given the privilege by Congress of dipping into the treasuries of the 12 Federal land banks and many joint-stock land banks, to make up any certain shortages that Uncle Sam may fail to provide. This money is used to cover such items as "examinations," so that the farmer really helps pay the bill of having his banks examined, for they are his banks, since he owns the capitalization of the banks (12 Federals), yet the board in Washington does the managing for him. This board may well be considered Exhibit A in the new era of bureaucracy, the day of the future when we shall have our business operated by bureaus and shall pay them for doing it. However, it should be noted in closing, that the farmer is thus far the only individual that has "stood hitched" while Congress "put the bureaucratic screw onto him." All other industries have side-stepped such domination. But how long they can stay "the hand of death" no one can say.

FARMER RISKS ENTIRE HOLDINGS WHEN HE SECURES FEDERAL FARM LOAN

Farm capital may be defined as the materials which the farmer uses in conducting his business. Both capital and credit are of vital importance in all business. Properly directed, they are of great value, but if improperly handled they may be the means of injury to the individual and the industry alike.

The amount of capital invested in farming is larger than in any other single industry in the United States. That so much capital is needed to carry on this business makes it a peculiarly important factor in the prosperity of the farming population. The average amount of capital per farm for 1900 was $3,374; for 1910, $6,444; and for 1920, $12,085.

Associations are formed for the purpose of obtaining credit. Probably the best known are the Federal farm-loan associations, established through the Federal land bank. This, however, furnishes loans only to the best security and for amounts not exceeding $25,000. It does not meet in full the farmers' needs for credit. The farmer most in need of capital is unable to get assistance from the Federal land bank through the association.

In Europe farm-loan associations have been formed which have bonded themselves to an unlimited extent for obtaining credit. Where such associations have been formed they have furnished the cheapest and most desirable form of credit available. In Germany where these associations have been most extensively developed 12 per cent of the land is not owned by the operator. It may not be that we would desire the same form of association as is used in the European countries, since most of our farm operators have considerable capital and might not care to risk their entire holdings for the debts of the association.

ELECTION OF DIRECTORS COMPLICATED

Amendments to the Federal farm loan act pertain largely to the personnel of the board and the directors of the land banks. The board, which previously consisted of five members, has been enlarged to seven. The Secretary of the Treasury is a member and chairman ex-officio of the board. The board of directors of each Federal land bank under the new act consists of seven members whose term of office is three years. Three known as district members are appointed by the Farm Loan Board and are to represent public interest; three known as local directors are elected by a rather complicated method by the national farm-loan associations. On nomination by the association and borrowers the Farm Loan Board is to select the seventh member who is to be known as the director at large, and who may be removed by the board. This allows the association to select three directors, the board an equal number, and the seventh member is selected by a compromise arrangement.

[Extract from report of Federal Farm Loan Bureau]

GOVERNMENT GOES INTO LAND OWNERSHIP THROUGH FORECLOSURE

Attached is report issued by the Federal Farm Loan Bureau, which shows that the superpolitical banking system, under its present administration, is going into the land business, with millions of acres of land in various States now taken over by the various banks, the total reported being valued at $16,314,880.97, carried under an item in "Memorandum," as "Less real estate acquired, charged off." In more than 1,000 counties from one to five foreclosure proceedings are now in process by attorneys representing the land banks, so an aggregate of several millions of dollars in present loans will soon be converted into an even larger item, and the system thus become the owner of millions of acres of abandoned farm lands. In some parts of the country the officials are making a vain attempt to dispose of this land, with no buyers seeking the properties. Some of the land upon which the banks have loaned large sums per acre are now discovered to be so poor, only a short time after their appraisal was made and the loan closed, that the land is adapted only to tree-planting operations, and is considered of no real farm productive value. In other words, this land can not be used for cropping. This represents a larger percentage of the land upon which loans have been made than the political appointees are willing to acknowledge.

It is notable that only 1 of the 12 Federal land banks placed its actual land holdings, acquired through foreclosure, in an item capable of being investigated. "Other assets" is a very ambiguous title, indeed. And are we sure that these are "assets" at all? Is it not possible that they might better be listed under the heading "Other liabilities"? For what possible asset is an abandoned farm, not even repaying income ample to meet taxes, not to mention semiannual interest charges and the 1 per cent principal payment?

WHAT THE FARMER OWNS THE POLITICIANS MANIPULATE

In the above statement it should be noted that of the capital stock originally subscribed by the Government—$8,892,130—to establish the 12 district Federal land banks, only $710,651 now remains unpaid. The farmer stockholders, through their loan associations, are now owners of $61,482,997 of the stock of these banks, the Government now owning about one-ninth of the capitalization of the banks; yet the Government, through present political domination, not only completely manages their own one-ninth interest but as well the eight-ninths which the farmer owns! This is without parallel in financial institutions in the world. Every other banking institution is managed by actual owners; that is, outside of Russia.

WHAT THE LAND BANKS OWN IN FARM LAND

It is interesting to further note the large amount of land that many of the land banks are now carrying as "other assets," and when we remember that these are increasing like a speeding snowball, collecting more and more abandoned farm lands as the months pass, it will be appreciated that these banks will soon become the largest owner of abandoned farms in the United States.

The following schedule furnishes the figures as released by the Farm Loan Board relative to the 12 district land banks:

Reports submitted to the Farm Loan Board, February 29, 1928

	Springfield	Baltimore	Columbia	Louisville	New Orleans	St. Louis
Real estate acquired, charged off	$592,462.25	$528,576.84	$1,708,807.21	$988,103.20	$1,600,111.45	$781,928.01

KEEP POLITICS OUT OF BANKING

One of the greatest present dangers is the repeated attempts to make the banking system subject to political influence. Banking and politics are like oil and water—they do not mix; they should not mix, but we have to make them mix; and it is of paramount importance that Washington officials be strong and courageous to prevent any inroads of political influence, which will always be a menace.

Farming is a science. It takes just as smart a man to make a successful farmer as it does a banker or a life-insurance president. Many times I think it requires more brains. Agriculture to-day, if left alone by politicians, would get out of trouble sooner and stay out longer than by any attempt to pull it out of the hole by legislation.

[Extract by James Lee Loomis, president of the Mutual Life Insurance Co., Hartford, Conn.]

LIFE INSURANCE FINANCES FARMERS

The total farm-mortgage indebtedness may be approximately $9,000,000,000. The farm-mortgage investment of all the life-insurance companies is roughly 24 per cent of the total farm-mortgage indebtedness. At the close of 1921, the 52 companies had loaned to the agricultural interests of the country $1,322,000,000, or 17.7 per cent of our assets at that time. This investment has steadily increased in volume to the estimated amount, at the close of 1927, of $1,999,000,000, which represents 15.2 per cent of the assets.

This item of December 31, 1926, stood at $1,942,000,000, exceeding by $232,000,000 the outstanding mortgages of the Federal and joint-stock land banks as of the same date. December 31, 1921, these institutions held farm-mortgage holdings to the amount of $518,000,000. At the end of 1926 their farm-mortgage holdings aggregated $1,710,000,000. In the past few years, an undetermined but nevertheless large amount of mortgages has been taken over from banks, chiefly in the Central West, and is now being carried by life-insurance companies.

GOVERNMENT A FAILURE IN BUSINESS

There are those who would have the pioneer spirit abandoned—that American spirit of individual initiative and enterprise which has been responsible for the inception of industry, its development, its accomplishment. They would have the Government in business, piecemeal at first, completely in the end. They maintain that government—State or Federal, or both in combination—could do a better job than has been done by those responsible for what we have to-day.

We do not believe in that. We don't want the Government to go into business; we don't believe it could do as good a job as could be done by private initiative and private capital. We don't believe that Government competition with private initiative in busness can be productive of good either for the Government or the public.

GOVERNMENT NOT BUILT FOR BUSINESS

Our Government was not built to enter into business. And if the Government were eventually to take over business, I can imagine nothing more detrimental to the welfare of business and its people than this substitution of political control and bureaucratic inertia for the spirit which has made industry great. On that spirit I maintain our Government must rely for future progress and development in industry.

It has been said that industry is afraid of losing business where Government would compete, and still more afraid of having its "octopus grip" on the public broken. Industry could survive any such loss of business and still grow and prosper. If it couldn't meet any rates the Government could maintain on accurate computation of costs it ought to go out of business.

OBJECTS TO SOCIALIZATION OF BUSINESS

Industry is not apprehensive on that count. What it objects to is any beginning of socialization of business publicly owned, officially regulated by the public's own representatives, which under American pioneer spirit has constructed a record of measurable public service and is able to keep on going and better that record.

No other problem of the future bothers us of industry. This problem of Government invasion, to be sure, is not ours alone. It is yours. It is the public's, since it is public money which must be taken to put the Government into business. It is still more the public's, since the question whether Government shall enter business—any business, anywhere—involves a fundamental departure from American principles.

[Extracts from address by United States Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, of Georgia, before the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, New York City]

ADJUSTING GOVERNMENT TO NEW DEMANDS

A long while ago it was said that a State's soul is nothing else than its political principles. A State may of course change its character, either by revolution or by the more gradual process of evolution. Where the Government is one of delegated powers, expressly defined and precisely limited, its principles can not be abandoned without losing its soul. Our Constitution is not a mere declaration of public policy. It is not on a level with statutory enactment. It is the supreme law of the land. The outposts of legitimate governmental activities are fixed in our organic laws, both local and general. Our political machinery was adapted and designed to safeguard political liberty. The basic philosophy of our system is the concept of liberty as the indefeasible right of the individual as a responsible moral being. This liberty, in no sense derivative but inherent in the individual, we sought to safeguard in our organic laws.

MONARCHY VERSUS DEMOCRACY

Unlike monarchy, which proceeds on the theory that ordinary men are incapable of self-government and must therefore be regulated in their lives and business by those in authority, democracy, as we know it, asserts the right and capacity of common men to govern themselves. Applied to business its aim and ideal is the maximum of freedom, the minimum of restriction. Affording the largest opportunity to men to live their lives, regulate their conduct, and carry on their business without restraint save in the interest of the general welfare, our form of government has broken the chains of superstition, fear, and despair, liberated the minds of men and permitted them to develop in the atmosphere of freedom. Historians generally have agreed that our marvelous material progress is due to the influence of the pioneer spirit. It is no exaggeration to say that the material achievements of America are not due primarily to our great natural resources but to the imagination, initiative, genius, and energy fostered and developed by our free institutions. The first condition of continued business prosperity is, of course, stability in government, and stability in government must depend upon the intelligence of the individual and the fidelity with which we adhere to the principles of constitutional government.

MUST BE IN HARMONY WITH BASIC PRINCIPLES

It follows that we can not change our political machinery to meet the exigencies of changing conditions, but, within the limitations fixed by our Constitution, we must from time to time readjust our policies. Our system is not the night-watchman theory of government. "The equal rights of man and the happiness of every individual" are yet "the only legitimate objects of government." The adjustment of government to meet new demands must be in harmony with our basic principles. Our supreme danger is not from the lawbreaker, but from the lawmaker, as President Hadley has pointed out. The supreme need of the present is to turn government back toward the bill of rights and the Constitution, abandon the stupid policy of projecting government more and more into private business, as wholly inconsistent with the principles which we have declared.

It merely means the application of sane principles to existing conditions. Our conception of national sovereignty may relieve us of obligations and responsibilities, but it can not relieve us of consequences.

WE MUST PROTECT PROPERTY RIGHTS

We must continue to recognize the obligation to protect the life and property of our citizens, but the property right asserted by the American citizen in any part of the globe must square with the highest code of morality.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The morning business is closed, and the Senator from Maine is recognized.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill 12286, making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before that request is granted, may I ask the Senator from Maine whether it is his purpose to have the bill disposed of finally before 3 o'clock, or does he merely desire to have it taken up for the consideration of committee amendments and get a final vote on the bill later?

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator that I had hoped to get through with the bill before 3 o'clock; but one Senator has told me that he could not be here, and that he would not want a final vote taken on the bill to-day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well; then I have no objection to proceeding with the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. It ought to be understood that the bill will not go over simply for a final vote.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no, Mr. President, that is not my purpose. I am simply going to have the bill taken up, with the understanding that a final vote can not be had to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the understanding be also that after to-day it will be subject to any amendment that any Senator may want to offer?

Mr. HALE. That, of course, is understood.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want any misunderstanding about it. There will be several amendments offered, or suggested, and perhaps it would be impossible to dispose of them to-day, even if there were no understanding about not taking a final vote to-day.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Maine what, if any, cognizance the bill takes of the building program? Does the committee make any appropriation in the bill to cover that?

Mr. HALE. There are no appropriations in the bill for the so-called new building program. There are large appropriations for increases of the Navy, but they are simply appropriations for ships that have already been started, that are under way. The so-called House building program has not yet been taken up by the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, and until that is done appropriations can not be made under that program. That will follow. After this bill shall have been disposed of we will probably take that up in the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BORAH. There is nothing in this bill, then, that in any way commits us to any proposition which might be involved in the building program?

Mr. HALE. I think not.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says he thinks not; does he not know?

Mr. HALE. There is no appropriation for anything in the nature of construction of ships.

Mr. BORAH. Are there any appropriations which are in this bill by reason of what the Senator expects will be done under the building program?

Mr. HALE. I think not; no. There are none there with the knowledge of the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would it be possible in an appropriation bill brought up now to make appropriations for construction that has not already been authorized by law?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, we could do it if we wanted to, but what I wish to know is whether there is any effort to do it.

Mr. HALE. No; nothing along that line has been done with the knowledge of the committee, and I do not think anything of the sort has been done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no construction appropriation in this bill?

Mr. HALE. There is an appropriation to carry out construction that has already been commenced. There are appropriations to carry out construction of the V–5 and V–6, and the eight cruisers that were authorized in 1926.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice in the report it is stated that the amount appropriated exceeds the appropriations for the fiscal year 1928 by nearly $25,000,000. Is that additional appropriation for the building of ships which are already in the course of construction?

Mr. HALE. It is partly that and partly for increase in aviation.

Mr. NORRIS. Why is such a large amount necessary?

Mr. HALE. I was about to explain it.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. I will withhold any comment and give the Senator an opportunity to explain the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12286) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have some remarks to make about the bill, but first I will ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for the consideration of amendments, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the amount carried in the bill as it passed the House was $359,418,237. The Senate Committee on Appropriations has added to this $4,318,780.69. The bill as reported to the Senate carries $363,737,017.69. This is $24,930,539.79 in excess of the appropriations for the current fiscal year 1928.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has spoken about the increase. I will say that there is an increase in the bill of something over $11,000,000 for aviation and $13,000,000 over and above what was made available during the current year for increase of the Navy. That takes care of the increase over last year.

Mr. NORRIS. My attention was diverted for a moment. I hope the Senator will pardon me, but will he state again just how that increase is divided?

Mr. HALE. There is an increase of about $11,000,000 for aviation over the current year and about $13,000,000 for increase of the Navy. That is, we appropriate about $13,000,000 more for increase of the Navy than will be spent during the present fiscal year.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that partly for enlisted men and partly for additional ships?

Mr. HALE. That is for construction of the new cruisers and two submarines that are not yet finished.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. DILL. What is the additional amount for operations and carrying on of the activities of the Navy Establishment as provided in the bill?

Mr. HALE. The additional amount is between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 more than it was last year, taking out new construction of airplanes and ships, and so forth.

Mr. DILL. Is there any additional amount provided for the marines who are being used in outlying parts of the world?

Mr. HALE. There is about $1,000,000 more in this bill than in last year's bill, part of which is to take care of the marines who are in China and Nicaragua, on account of the added expenses which they have now which they did not have before.

Mr. DILL. How much of that amount is being spent because of the election program upon which we have embarked in Nicaragua?

Mr. HALE. I can not give the Senator the exact amount. This will probably be taken care of in the expenses for the Marine Corps in deficiency bills.

Mr. DILL. Is there any legislative provision in the bill that authorizes a part of the money to be spent to supervise elections in a foreign country?

Mr. HALE. No; it does not so appear in the bill. All we have done is to increase the general appropriations for the Marine Corps by $1,000,000, and the items are scattered all through the bill. Nothing is said with reference to any specific work.

Mr. DILL. With a view to it being used for that purpose?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. DILL. I shall have more to say about that at a later time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since the matter is brought up, may I ask the Senator a question? He said there is no money appropriated in the bill for the purpose of supervising elections in foreign countries.

Mr. HALE. I say there is nothing in the bill indicating that it is for any such purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the point I want to bring out. There is evidently a way to use that money for that purpose, is there not?

Mr. HALE. The appropriation is made for taking care of the marines while they are in foreign countries.

Mr. NORRIS. Out of what appropriation or from what particular items do they use the money to supervise an election in a foreign country?

Mr. HALE. The general care and subsistence of the marines.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not mean to tell us that the appropriation for subsistence of the marines would necessarily mean that they would have to supervise an election?

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; but while they are supervising elections they have to live.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but what is the particular language that authorizes the President or anybody else to go to the expense of supervising an election? The marines have to do something besides live, do they not? I would like to find out the law or the language in the appropriation bill that gives authority to the President to supervise an election in a foreign country.

Mr. HALE. There is nothing of the sort in this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there anything in any existing law which does that?

Mr. HALE. As to that I can not answer the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is nothing of that kind in the bill, then would it not follow, if the bill is enacted into law, that the President would have no authority to use for supervising elections in foreign countries the money appropriated in the bill, if the Senator is right in his statement?

Mr. HALE. The money is appropriated to take care of the Marine Corps wherever the Marine Corps may be. The Senator can not say that the marines should not be taken care of if they were in a foreign country.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator said there is no money appropriated in this bill for the purpose of supervising an election in a foreign country. I want to find out what the language is in existing law which gives that authority. If there is no such authority in the bill, then at the end of this fiscal year the President could not supervise elections in foreign countries any more, could he?

Mr. HALE. I do not think that has anything to do with this particular bill. If the Senator objects to the marines going there, I suggest that he take the matter up with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NORRIS. The chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee is not the commander of the marines. Somebody has to pay the expenses of the marines, and I assume that in this bill provision is being made for payment of the expenses of the marines. What I am trying to have the Senator explain—and it is a fair question, I think—is how the President will be enabled to carry on the supervision of elections in foreign countries if the bill makes no provision for that purpose, and the Senator has said it does not.

Mr. HALE. It does not have to. The bill provides for the maintenance of the Marine Corps in a number of different respects, and that is all it provides.

Mr. NORRIS. That is begging the question. I am trying to find out how the President would get along in supervising elections in foreign countries if the bill now before us, which makes appropriations for the Marine Corps, does not make any such provision.

Mr. HALE. It does not make any specific provision and does not have to.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, it does not have to?

Mr. HALE. I do not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the expense of supervising elections in foreign countries carried in some other appropriation bill than this?

Mr. HALE. That I could not say.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, it seems to me, ought to know whether the money can be used for paying the expenses of carrying on or supervising elections.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it is used for the expense of carrying on elections. It is used for the expense of the marines while they are engaged in that work.

Mr. NORRIS. While they are carrying on an election?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator can get any difference out of that, he is shrewder than I am. I can not see any difference. I would like to know, and I have a right to know, it seems to me, and the Senator is the person who ought to be able to give the information, just how the expense of carrying on elections or supervising elections in foreign countries is met and how the money is obtained to carry on those elections. The Senator has said that there is no appropriation in the pending bill for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. There is no specific wording referring to it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says "specific wording."

Mr. HALE. There is no wording of that nature or anything referring to it.

Mr. NORRIS. If the bill becomes law, will the President be compelled to cease carrying on and paying the expenses of elections in foreign countries, or can he go on as he has in the past?

Mr. HALE. The increases which have been made are on certain items. For instance, the item for provisions has been increased $242,543 above last year. The item for clothing has been increased, as have also the items for military stores, transportation, and recruiting, and repairs of barracks.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator a further question. If the bill has no provision in it for the carrying on or supervising of elections in foreign countries, I suppose the Senator would have no objection to an amendment which would make that specific and provide that none of the money here appropriated should be used for the carrying on of elections or paying the expenses of the marines for carrying on or supervising elections in foreign countries?

Mr. HALE. I do not think that would be advisable at all. The marines are not supervising elections in Nicaragua because they want to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is nothing in the bill which provides that now, why would the Senator object to making it specific and removing any doubt?

Mr. HALE. I do not think Congress would want to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not make any difference what Congress wants. We are supervising elections in foreign countries, but Congress has not anything to do with it.

Mr. HALE. This is a question of what Congress wants.

Mr. DILL. The fact is that the money which is paid for the supervising of these elections is in the appropriation for the marines. That is the fact, is it not?

Mr. HALE. It is to take care of the subsistence of the marines in China or Nicaragua or anywhere else they may be.

Mr. DILL. That is where they expect to get the money which will be used for the marines in the supervision of these elections?

Mr. HALE. For their subsistence.

Mr. DILL. Why not answer the question?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, Mr. President, we understand all this.

Mr. DILL. I want to get it clear.

Mr. WARREN. This is an annual appropriation bill. The President has certain rights because he is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. I suggest that the Senator go to him if he wants to know these details.

Mr. DILL. Oh, no; I am going to the right place now. I am inquiring of those in charge of the bill, who should know.

Mr. WARREN. This is the annual supply bill for food, clothing, and incidental expenses for the Navy and Marine Corps.

Mr. DILL. And this is the place to stop the money from being spent, and not by going to the President.

Mr. WARREN. This is the place to fill the RECORD, so the Senator may go ahead.

Mr. DILL. This is the place to put our hand on the place the money comes from. The Senator's language does not answer that proposition.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the appropriation includes money which has been spent for ammunition that is used in carrying on this war down in Nicaragua, does it not?

Mr. HALE. I do not think there have been any increases for that purpose. I do not know of any increases for that purpose.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does not know whether there has been an increase for that purpose?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. WHEELER. What have been the actual increases in the appropriation for maintaining and shipping the marines to Nicaragua?

Mr. HALE. There has been a general increase for the Marine Corps of $1,104,636 over last year. That includes $671,916 for pay of the Marine Corps. That means that the pay has gone up largely because men have gone into different grades. That would not be accounted for by the Nicaragua expedition in any way. Then the pay of the civilian force is $1,720 increase over last year. However, under the Quartermaster Department there are provisions, $242,543; clothing, $39,800; military stores, $45,657; transportation and recruiting, $23,000. Repairs of barracks has been reduced.

Mr. NORRIS. They do not need barracks in Nicaragua. It is warm down there.

Mr. HALE. Contingent expenses, $85,000; Marine Corps Reserve, $40,000.

Mr. WHEELER. Can the Senator tell us just how much money has been expended by the Marine Corps or by the Government by reason of the fact that the marines have been kept and are being kept in Nicaragua?

Mr. HALE. Those figures will have to be worked out for the deficiency bill when it comes to us.

Mr. WHEELER. Those figures will have to be worked out in a deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes. These are appropriations for the next fiscal year. These are the appropriations which will be expended in the next fiscal year.

Mr. WHEELER. Has the Navy Department any figures at the present time?

Mr. HALE. They will have to be submitted for the next deficiency bill which comes before the Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. I am asking if they have not any figures now? Have they no figures as to how much it has cost up to the present time?

Mr. HALE. I do not know whether the department has, but we have not the figures here. They are not of any particular value, because until the deficiency bill comes to Congress and they find out how they stand at that time, it would not be of any particular value to know.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question. Will there probably be any increase on account of supporting the marines in Nicaragua rather than in this country? I suppose there will, perhaps, be some saving. Can the Senator give us any idea as to that?

Mr. HALE. I presume it costs more to take care of marines in Nicaragua and in China than to take care of them in this country.

Mr. NORRIS. What I want to get at is, can the Government keep them there cheaper or save money by keeping them there?

Mr. HALE. I think it will cost more to keep them there than to keep them in this country.

Mr. NORRIS. Then there would be an increase in the appropriation.

Mr. HALE. I have said that there is an increase in the appropriation for the Marine Corps for next year.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, what I am trying to find out is how much that increase will be. I think we ought to be able to have those figures now.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator mean the absolute amount of increase which will be necessary?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I have given the items.

Mr. WHEELER. Can the Senator tell me how much of an increase is carried in this bill for the marines on account of their activities in Haiti when they kept the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] out of that country?

Mr. HALE. No; I can not tell that at all.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator has not the figures as to that?

Mr. HALE. I can get the figures.

Mr. CARAWAY. Was there any extra charge for that?

Mr. WHEELER. I am assuming that there was an extra expense. I am trying to find out from the Senator from Maine whether or not there was. Can the Senator tell us what the extra expense has been in keeping the marines in China?

Mr. HALE. No; I have not the figures. I think that item will go in the deficiency bill for this year. That bill has not as yet been prepared.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand an amendment is to be offered to the pending bill providing that the funds shall not be used for the purpose of keeping marines in Nicaragua, or at least that no more money shall be used to send marines into the various countries until the President of the United States shall at least get the approval of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HALE. That may be so. I do not know whether such an amendment is to be offered or not. The Senator may know.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me ask this question: Is it the purpose of the Senator to have this bill passed this afternoon?

Mr. HALE. I have already told the Senate, Mr. President, that the bill would not be finally acted on this afternoon.

Mr. WHEELER. I was not in the Chamber when the statement was made, and, therefore, I did not hear it.

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BLEASE. I thought the Senator from Maine had finished.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. President, the increases that have been recommended by the Senate committee cover a very small number of subjects. In 1925, after a protracted fight in Congress, it was decided to appropriate for 86,000 men in the Navy. Since that time that number has been gradually reduced until now we have only 83,250 men. In 1925, with 2,750 more men in the Navy than we have during the current year, we were barely able to get along and keep the ships up to their proper complements. Since then aviation has developed to a very great extent, and the calls for men for that service are now between 4,000 and 5,000 more than in 1925. So, with 2,750 fewer men, and 5,000 men being used for other purposes, it follows that the Navy has 7,250 fewer men for running the fleet and conducting the shore activities than it had in 1925. To take care of that situation the complements of the fighting ships of the Navy have had to be cut down, so that now our battleships are running along with about 92 per cent of their regular complements; and that is not enough efficiently to run those ships. The complements of other ships of the Navy have had to be cut down to even a larger extent, some of them running at least 15 per cent below the normal peace-time complements.

Your committee has had hearings on this matter and the House committee also had full hearings. We feel that by going back to the 86,000 men we had in 1925 we shall be able partially to bring up the complements of the fighting ships of the Navy to what they should be, and also to add a certain amount to the shore establishment, which is just as necessary as is the fleet establishment if we are going to maintain a United States fleet. We have accordingly increased the appropriation for pay of the men so as to take care of 86,000 men this year. That increase amounts to $2,735,025.

Another item that we have increased, Mr. President, is the pay of the field employees. There are about 6,000 field employees in the Navy who are not getting the wages or promotions that they feel they ought to get and to which your committee feels they are entitled. In 1862 the mechanics and laborers under the Navy Department were taken care of as to their pay by the appointment of wage boards in the various naval districts. Those wage boards made an examination in such districts of the wages of civilians doing similar work, and reported back to the wage board of review at Washington what rates of pay civilians doing similar work in the naval districts were receiving. On those figures, as civilian compensation, the board of review established rates of pay for the mechanics and laborers under the Naval Establishment.

The men who are now in the field service, the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger force, were not at that time under the law of 1862. They were paid regular salaries as determined by the Secretary of the Navy. In 1920 the department ordered the wage boards in the various districts to report figures as to the clerical, messenger, inspection, and drafting forces as well; so that they were thereby taken under the law of 1862. In 1923 the classification law was enacted. It was the intention to take care of these men under that law, but for some reason it was not found possible to do so. The understanding was that a further report was to be made, and that thereafter they would be taken under the classification law. That report has never yet been made.

These men find themselves now in a curious position. The Comptroller General has ruled that, while they are not actually in the classified service under the classification act their pay may not exceed the pay that is provided for the classified service, which classified service in the case of the Navy applies only to men who are in the department. These men can not get the advantages of the law of 1862, and they can not come under the law as provided in the classification act until a report is made. So they are more or less at sea, and there is considerable dissatisfaction on account of the situation.

The House committee and the House itself saw fit to raise the pay of the classified employees in the department—those who are here in the District of Columbia—a sufficient sum to give a promotion to deserving employees, and we have done the same thing for the field employees. It is estimated that it will take care of about 2,275 of these 6,000 employees, and that in no case will it give them enough to raise the pay of the employees in a grade above the average pay of that grade. We have appropriated for this purpose $408,000, of which $141,000 is for increases in the forces in the service, and the balance for increased appropriations for those already in.

There are about 26 or 28 amendments to the bill which refer to this specific purpose.

Another item of considerable size which we have added is the item for reserve aviation. Naval Reserve aviation uses about 45 planes during the course of the year. They now have on hand 23 planes that are in good condition and can be used this year and 25 planes that have become practically obsolete or obsolescent.

They need new planes each year, and in the past they have had new planes. This year the Budget estimated for 22 additional planes for the reserves. The House, however, left out this matter, and no provision was made for it. The Senate has put it back. That is a matter of $635,000. I may state that that was estimated for by the Budget.

We have also added $222,000 in the Bureau of Yards and Docks; $157,000 of that is for replacement of a boiler at Annapolis. Two years ago one of the boilers used in the experimental station there blew up, and it never has been replaced. A large portion of the building is exposed to the weather on account of it, and the men who are doing the work there now have to work under unsatisfactory conditions. Your committee felt that it was necessary to take care of this matter. Also at Melville, R. I., we have provided $65,000 for the replacement of a boiler plant. The present boiler plant in use there is in very bad condition, and it is not safe to use it at the present time. Both of these items have been estimated for by the Bureau of the Budget.

That takes care of the larger items, I think, that we have.

We have also put back for the Marine Corps Reserve certain items that were cut out by the House, but in no case in these items have we gone above the Budget estimate.

For the Naval Reserve we have added the sum of $65,820, as estimated by the Budget, to take care of 30 reserve aviators for advanced training with the fleet. Last year, 50 of the reserve aviators took this training. This year, the House cut down the number to 20. We have brought it back to 50. It is through these reserve aviators that it is hoped partially to make up for the shortage that now exists in naval aviators and pilots, and your committee felt justified in putting back this amount.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if I may at this time, I should like to offer two amendments to the pending bill for consideration when the amendments are in order, and to say just a word as to the amendments. They are for the purpose of permitting other bids to be received for the construction of the two dirigibles contemplated, as I understand, under the bill. The chairman of the committee has just informed me that one of these amendments has already been accepted, so I will offer the second amendment.

Mr. HALE. It has not been accepted, Mr. President. It was recommended by the committee, and I shall offer it on the floor.

Mr. EDGE. I prefer, of course, to have the chairman offer it. Then I will offer the second amendment, on page 34, line 20: After the word "airships," insert "if entered into with one contractor."

The purpose of that amendment is simply that if two airships are authorized, and two different firms have contracts awarded to them, each firm would be assured that the building of the airship would not be terminated or canceled after they had gone to great expense for building hangars and purchasing the necessary paraphernalia; in other words, they would be assured that the Government would go through with the contract. I think the amendment is a perfectly proper one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

The Secretary will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Naval Establishment, office of the Secretary, pay, miscellaneous," on page 2, line 6, after the words "attendance of," to strike out "one representative" and insert "two representatives"; in line 8, before the word "from," to strike out "a delegate" and insert "delegates"; in line 10, after the words "attendance of," to strike out "two representatives" and insert "one representative"; and in line 12, after the words "designated as," to strike out "delegates" and insert "a delegate," so as to read:

For commissions and interest; transportation of funds; exchange; for traveling expenses of civilian employees; for the expenses of the attendance of two representatives of the Navy Department who may be designated as delegates from the United States to attend the meetings of the International Research Council or of its branches; for the expenses for the attendance of one representative of the Navy Department who may be designated as a delegate of the United States to attend the International Hydrographic Conference.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, at the end of line 19, to increase the appropriation for pay, miscellaneous, office of the Secretary, from $1,510,000 to $1,531,523.20.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, at the end of line 2, to strike out "$495,000" and insert "$516,523.20," so as to read:

Provided further, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards and naval stations, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, shall not exceed $516,523.20.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Temporary government for West Indian islands," on page 4, line 19, after the word "President," to strike out "$240,000" and insert "$280,000"; in line 21, after the word "of," to strike out "$35,500" and insert "$20,000"; on page 5, line 2, after the words "the sum of," to strike out "$240,000" and insert "$280,000"; and in line 3, after the word "the," to strike out "$240,000" and insert "$280,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For expenses incident to the occupation of the Virgin Islands and to the execution of the provisions of the act providing a temporary government for the West Indian islands acquired by the United States from Denmark, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1917, to be applied under the direction of the President, $280,000, and in addition thereto such an amount (not in excess of $20,000) as may be equivalent to (a) the total of the unobligated balances of the revenues collected and paid into the treasuries of such islands during the fiscal year 1928, and of the appropriation, "Temporary government for West Indian islands, 1928," plus (b) the sum by which the revenues collected and paid into the treasuries of such islands during the fiscal year 1929 exceed the sum of $280,000: Provided, That no part of the $280,000 shall be paid to anyone holding office in the Colonial Councils of the Virgin Islands or other public office under the government of said islands who owes allegiance to any country other than the United States of America.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval reserve laboratory," on page 6, at the end of line 5, to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$201,893.49," so as to read:

For laboratory and research work and other necessary work of the naval research laboratory for the benefit of the naval service, including operation and maintenance of a laboratory, additions to equipment necessary properly to carry on work in hand, maintenance of buildings and grounds, the temporary employment of such scientific civilian assistants as may become necessary, and subscriptions to technical periodicals, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, $201,893.49.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 11, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$85,000" and insert "$86,893.49," so as to read:

Provided, That $15,000 of this appropriation shall be available for the temporary employment of civilian scientists and technicists required on special problems: Provided further, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for technical, drafting, clerical, and messenger service shall not exceed $86,893.49 in addition to the amount authorized by the preceding proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Navigation, recreation for enlisted men, Navy," on page 6, line 18, after the word "prescribe," to strike out "$400,000" and insert "$401,500"; and in line 21, to strike out "$35,000" and insert "$36,500," so as to make the paragraph read:

For the recreation, amusement, comfort, contentment, and health of the Navy, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, under such regulations as he may prescribe, $401,500: Provided, That the amount paid from this appropriation for personal services of field employees, exclusive of temporary services, shall not exceed $36,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Instruments and supplies, Bureau of Navigation," on page 8, at the end of line 14, to strike out "$580,000" and insert "$580,300"; so as to make the paragraph read:

For supplies for seamen's quarters; and for the purchase of all other articles of equipage at home and abroad; and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith and manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; all pilotage and towage of ships of war; canal tolls, wharfage, dock and port charges, and other necessary incidental expenses of a similar nature; services and materials in repairing, correcting, adjusting, and testing compasses on shore and on board ship; nautical and astronomical instruments and repairs to same, and pay of chronometer caretakers; libraries for ships of war, professional books, schoolbooks, and papers; maintenance of gunnery and other training classes; compasses, compass fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ship's compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ship's way and leads and other appliances for sounding; photographs, photographic instruments and materials, printing outfit and materials; and for the necessary civilian electricians for gyrocompass testing and inspection; in all, $580,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Ocean and lake surveys, Bureau of Navigation," on page 8, at the end of line 19, to strike out "$80,000" and insert "$80,860," so as to read:

For hydrographic surveys, including the pay of the necessary hydrographic surveyors cartographic draftsmen, and recorders, and for the purchase of nautical books, charts, and sailing directions, $80,860.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Reserve," on page 10, line 5, after the word "duties," to strike out "$4,020,000" and insert "$4,085,820"; and in line 8, after the word "than," to strike out "$73,531" and insert "$76,431," so as to make the paragraph read:

For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve and Naval Militia; pay and allowances of officers and enrolled and enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when employed on authorized training duty; mileage for officers while traveling under orders to and from training duty; transportation of enrolled and enlisted men to and from training duty, and subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; subsistence of enrolled and enlisted men during the actual period of training duty; subsistence of officers and enrolled and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve while performing authorized training or other duty without pay; pay, mileage, and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve and pay, allowances, and subsistence of enrolled and enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when ordered to active duty in connection with the instruction, training, and drilling of the Naval Reserve; pay of officers and enrolled and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve for the performance of drills or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and administrative duties, $4,085,820, of which amount not more than $180,000 shall be available for maintenance and rental of armories, including pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage, not more than $76,431 shall be available for clerical and messenger services for Naval Reserve administration in naval stations and districts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, not more than $609,555 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for aviation material, equipment, fuel, and rental of hangars, and not more than $790,000 shall be available in addition to other appropriations, for fuel and the transportation thereof, and for all other expenses in connection with the maintenance, operation, repair, and upkeep of vessels assigned for training the Naval Reserve.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval War College, Bureau of Navigation," on page 12, line 24, after the word "grounds," to strike out "$101,000" and insert "$103,775"; on page 13, line 4, after the words "in all," to strike out "$110,000" and insert "$112,775"; and at the end of line 8, to strike out "$68,118" and insert "$70,893," so as to make the paragraph read:

For maintenance of the Naval War College on Coasters Harbor Island, including care of grounds, $103,775; services of a professor of international law, $2,000; services of civilian lecturers, rendered at the War College, $2,000; care and preservation of the library, including the purchase, binding, and repair of books of reference and periodicals, $5,000; in all, $112,775: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, inspection, drafting, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, shall not exceed $70,893.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Home, Philadelphia, Pa.," on page 13, at the end of line 12, to increase the appropriation for pay of employees at rates of pay to be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy, from "$73,425" to "$75,165."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 4, to increase the total appropriation for the Naval Home, Philadelphia, Pa., from "$175,000" to "$176,740."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Engineering, engineering," on page 15, at the end of line 11, to strike out "$19,400,000" and insert "$19,448,450"; and at the end of line 17, to strike out "$1,575,000" and insert "$1,623,450," so as to make the paragraph read:

For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, auxiliary machinery, and boilers of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats, distilling and refrigerating apparatus; repairs, preservation, and renewals of electric interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate machinery belonging to other bureaus; searchlights and fire-control equipments for antiaircraft defense at shore stations; maintenance and operation of coast signal service; equipage, supplies, and materials under the cognizance of the bureau required for the maintenance and operation of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats; care, custody, and operation of the naval petroleum reserves; purchase, installation, repair, and preservation of machinery, tools, and appliances in navy yards and stations, pay of classified field force under the bureau; incidental expenses for naval vessels, navy yards, and stations, inspectors' offices, the engineering experiment station, such as photographing, technical books and periodicals, stationery, and instruments; services, instruments and apparatus, supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work; payment of part time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed; in all, $19,448,450: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and offices of United States inspectors of machinery and naval material for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, shall not exceed $1,623,450.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Construction and Repair—Construction and repair, Bureau of Construction and Repair," on page 16, line 17, after the word "bureau," to insert "services, instruments and apparatus, supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work;"; on page 17, line 17, after the word "vessels," to strike out "$17,200,000" and insert "$17,302,000"; and in line 24 to strike out "$1,800,000" and insert "$1,902,000," so as to read:

Construction and repair of vessels: For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; steam steerers, steam capstans, steam windlasses, and all other auxiliaries; labor in navy yards and on foreign station; purchase of machinery and tools for use in shops; carrying on work of experimental model tank and wind tunnel; designing naval vessels; construction and repair of yard craft, lighters, and barges; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat; general care and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair; incidental expenses for vessels and navy yards, inspectors' offices, such as photographing, books, professional magazines, plans, stationery, and instruments for drafting room, and for pay of classified field force under the bureau; services, instruments and apparatus, supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work; for payment of part time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed; for hemp, wire, iron, and other materials for the manufacture of cordage, anchors, cables, galleys, and chains; specifications for purchase thereof shall be so prepared as shall give fair and free competition; canvas for the manufacture of sails, awnings, hammocks, and other work; interior appliances and tools for manufacturing purposes in navy yards and naval stations; and for the purchase of all other articles of equipage at home and abroad; and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith and manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; naval signals and apparatus, other than electric, namely, signals, lights, lanterns, running lights, and lamps and their appendages for general use on board ship for illuminating purposes; and oil and candles used in connection therewith; bunting and other materials for making and repairing flags of all kinds; for all permanent galley fittings and equipage; rugs, carpets, curtains, and hangings on board naval vessels, $17,302,000, of which sum $200,000 shall be available immediately: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, drafting, inspection, watchmen (ship keepers), and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and offices of superintending naval constructors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, shall not exceed $1,902,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Ordnance—Ordnance and ordnance stores, Bureau of Ordnance," on page 19, line 7, after the name "West Virginia," to strike out "$11,941,250" and insert "$11,965,250"; and in line 13, to strike out "$950,000" and insert "$974,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material, for the armament of ships; for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work under the cognizance of the Bureau of Ordnance; for furniture at naval ammunition depots, torpedo stations, naval ordnance plants, and proving grounds; for technical books; plant appliances as now defined by the "Navy classification of accounts"; for machinery and machine tools; for experimental work in connection with the development of ordnance material for the Navy; for maintenance of proving grounds, powder factory, torpedo stations, gun factory, ammunition depots, and naval ordnance plants, and for target practice; not to exceed $15,000 for minor improvements to buildings, grounds, and appurtenances of a character which can be performed by regular station labor; for payment of part time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy in his discretion at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed; for the maintenance, repair, and operation of horse-drawn and motor-propelled freight and passenger-carrying vehicles, to be used only for official purposes at naval ammunition depots, naval proving grounds, naval ordnance plants, and naval torpedo stations; for the pay of chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, naval ordnance plants, and naval ammunition depots, and for care and operation of schools during the fiscal year 1929 at ordnance stations at Indianhead, Md., Dahlgren, Va., and South Charleston, W. Va., $11,965,250: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, watchmen, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, naval ordnance plants, and naval ammunition depots for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, shall not exceed $974,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts—Pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel," on page 20, line 18, after the word "competitions," to strike out "$65,101,915" and insert "$66,871,072"; on page 21, line 1, after the name "Nurse Corps," to strike out "$1,889,160" and insert "$2,164,160"; and at the end of line 16 to strike out "$126,156,780" and insert "$128,200,937," so as to make the paragraph read:

Pay of naval personnel: For pay and allowances prescribed by law of officers on sea duty and other duty, and officers on waiting orders—pay, $28,748,197; rental allowance, $6,073,789; subsistence allowance, $3,631,327; in all, $38,453,313; officers on the retired list, $5,239,000; for hire of quarters for officers serving with troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government, and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them, and hire of quarters for officers and enlisted men on sea duty at such times as they may be deprived of their quarters on board ship due to repairs or other conditions which may render them uninhabitable, $3,000; pay of enlisted men on the retired list, $2,011,017; extra pay to men reenlisting after being honorably discharged, $1,596,175; interest on deposits by men, $1,800; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and apprentice seamen, including men in the engineers' force and men detailed for duty with the Fish Commission, enlisted men, men in trade schools, pay of enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, extra pay to men for diving and cash prizes for men for excellence in gunnery, target practice, and engineering competitions, $66,871,072; outfits for all enlisted men and apprentice seamen of the Navy on first enlistment at not to exceed $100 each, civilian clothing not to exceed $15 per man to men given discharges for bad conduct or undesirability or inaptitude, reimbursement in kind of clothing to persons in the Navy for losses in cases of marine or aircraft disasters or in the operation of water or air-borne craft, and the authorized issue of clothing and equipment to the members of the Nurse Corps, $2,164,160; pay of enlisted men undergoing sentence of court-martial, $213,000, and as many machinists as the President may from time to time deem necessary to appoint; and apprentice seamen under training at training stations and on board training ships, at the pay prescribed by law, $1,530,000; pay and allowances of the Nurse Corps, including assistant superintendents, directors, and assistant directors—pay $675,220, rental allowance $24,000, subsistence allowance $20,805, pay retired list $10,803; in all, $730,828; rent of quarters for members of the Nurse Corps; pay and allowances of Fleet Naval Reservists of the classes defined in sections 22, 23, 24, and 26 of the act of February 28, 1925, $9,232,572; reimbursement for losses of property under act of October 6, 1917, $5,000; payment of six months' death gratuity, $150,000; in all, $128,200,937.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$18,699,937" and insert "$19,232,680," so as to make the paragraph read:

Subsistence of naval personnel: For provisions and commuted rations for enlisted men of the Navy, which commuted rations may be paid to caterers of messes in case of death or desertion, upon orders of the commanding officers, at 50 cents per diem, and midshipmen at 80 cents per diem, and commuted rations stopped on account of sick in hospital and credited at the rate of 75 cents per ration to the naval hospital fund; subsistence of men unavoidably detained or absent from vessels to which attached under orders (during which subsistence rations to be stopped on board ship and no credit for commutation therefor to be given); quarters and subsistence of men on detached duty; subsistence of members of the Naval Reserve during period of active service; subsistence in kind at hospitals and on board ship in lieu of subsistence allowance of female nurses and Navy and Marine Corps general courts-martial prisoners undergoing imprisonment with sentences of dishonorable discharge from the service at the expiration of such confinement; in all, $19,232,680.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 16, after the words "in all," to strike out "$4,357,035" and insert "$4,515,160," so as to make the paragraph read:

Transportation and recruiting of naval personnel: For mileage and actual and necessary expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized by law to officers of the Navy while traveling under orders; for mileage, at 5 cents per mile, to midshipmen entering the Naval Academy while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as midshipmen, and not more than $2,500 shall be available for transportation of midshipmen, including reimbursement of traveling expenses while traveling under orders after appointment as midshipmen; for actual traveling expenses of female nurses; for travel allowance or for transportation and subsistence as authorized by law of enlisted men upon discharge; transportation of enlisted men and apprentice seamen and applicants for enlistment at home and abroad, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation to their homes, if residents of the United States, of enlisted men and apprentice seamen discharged on medical survey, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of sick or insane enlisted men and apprentice seamen and insane supernumerary patients to hospitals, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; apprehension and delivery of deserters and stragglers, and for railway guides and other expenses incident to transportation; expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; advertising for and obtaining men and apprentice seamen; actual and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage to officers on duty with traveling recruiting parties; transportation of dependents of officers and enlisted men; in all, $4,515,160.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 18, after the word "personnel," to change the total appropriation for pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel from "$149,213,752" to "$151,948,777."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," on page 25, line 1, after the name "Naval Establishment," to strike out "$9,647,000" and insert "$9,777,000"; and in line 7, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$2,975,000" and insert "$3,067,000," so as to read:

For equipage, supplies, and services under the cognizance of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, including stationery for commanding, executive, and navigating officers of ships, boards and courts on ships, and chaplains; services of civilian employees under the cognizance of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts; freight, express, and parcel-post charges pertaining to the Navy Department and Naval Establishment, $9,777,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for chemists and for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in the supply and accounting departments of the navy yards, naval stations, and disbursing offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, shall not exceed $3,067,000: Provided further, That hereafter the cost of transporting material purchased free on board cars or on wharf or free alongside vessels at points specified in contracts to the activities to which initial delivery is to be made shall be charged to the naval supply account fund, and after June 30, 1929, the cost of such transportation shall be added to the cost of material.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, medical department," on page 28, line 2, after the words "in all," to strike out "$2,030,000" and insert "$2,054,250," so as to read:

For surgeon's necessaries for vessels in commission, navy yards, naval stations, and Marine Corps; and for the civil establishment at the several naval hospitals, navy yards, naval medical supply depots, Naval Medical School and dispensary, Washington, and Naval Academy; for tolls and ferriages; purchase of books and stationery; hygienic and sanitary investigation and illustration; sanitary, hygienic, administrative, and special instruction, including the issuing of naval medical bulletins and supplements; purchase and repairs of nonpassenger-carrying wagons, automobile ambulances, and harness; purchase of and feed for horses and cows; maintenance, repair, and operation of three passenger-carrying motor vehicles for naval dispensary, Washington, D. C., and of one motor-propelled vehicle for official use only for the medical officer on out-patient medical service at the Naval Academy; trees, plants, care of grounds, garden tools, and seeds; incidental articles for the Naval Medical School and naval dispensary, Washington, naval medical supply depots, sick quarters at Naval Academy and marine barracks; washing for medical department at Naval Medical School and naval dispensary, Washington, naval medical supply depots, sick quarters at Naval Academy and marine barracks, dispensaries at navy yards and naval stations, and ships; and for minor repairs on buildings and grounds of the United States Naval Medical School and naval medical supply depots; rent of rooms for naval dispensary, Washington, D. C., not to exceed $1,200; for the care, maintenance, and treatment of the insane of the Navy and Marine Corps on the Pacific coast, including supernumeraries held for transfer to the Government Hospital for the Insane; for dental outfits and dental material; and all other necessary contingent expenses; in all, $2,054,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Care of the dead," on page 28, at the end of line 25, to increase the appropriation for the care of the dead, etc., from "$60,000" to "$75,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Yards and Docks—Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 29, line 14, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$1,035,000," so as to read:

For the labor, materials, and supplies necessary, as determined by the Secretary of the Navy, for the general maintenance of the activities and properties now or hereafter under the cognizance of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, including the purchase, exchange (including parts), maintenance, repair, and operation of passenger-carrying vehicles for the Navy Department (not to exceed nine in number) and the Naval Establishment not otherwise provided for, and including not to exceed $1,035,000 for clerical, inspection, drafting, messenger, and other classified work in the field, $7,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 22, after the name "Secretary of the Navy," to insert "shall sell, or exchange"; and in line 23, after the word "more," to strike out "shall sell or exchange," so as to read:

Provided, That during the fiscal year 1929 the motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles to be purchased hereunder shall not exceed the following respective numbers and costs: Six at $2,000 each, 6 at $1,500 each, 17 at $650 each, and 12 at $450 each: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall sell, or exchange in part payment for such new vehicles to cost $1,200 or more, the following respective numbers of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles in use and of makes which now cost in excess of the following respective prices per vehicle to replace: Ten at $2,000 each and 2 at $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 31, after line 6, to insert:

Engineering experiment station, Annapolis, Md.: Replacement of boiler house, boiler, and auxiliaries, $157,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after line 6, to insert:

Naval fuel depot, Melville, R. I.: Replacement of boiler plant, $65,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after line 14, to insert:

Naval air station, Pensacola, Fla.: Of the appropriation of $800,000 for repairs due to hurricane damage, naval air station, Pensacola, Fla., contained in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1927, an amount not exceeding $165,000 shall be available immediately and remain available until June 30, 1929, for the erection of a concrete bridge at such naval air station.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Aeronautics, Aviation, Navy," on page 34, line 14, after the word "equipment," to strike out "$9,675,000" and insert "$9,740,000," so as to read:

For aviation, as follows: For navigational, photographic, aerological, radio, and miscellaneous equipment, including repairs thereto, for use with aircraft built or building on June 30, 1928, $1,250,000; for maintenance, repair, and operation of aircraft factory, air stations, fleet, and all other aviation activities, testing laboratories, for overhauling of planes, and for the purchase for aviation purposes only of special clothing, wearing apparel, and special equipment, $9,740,000, including $400,000 for the equipment of vessels with catapults and including not to exceed $300,000 for the procurement of helium of which such amounts as may be required may be transferred in advance to the Bureau of Mines; for continuing experiments and development work on all types of aircraft, including the payment of part time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed, $2,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 25, after the word "service," to strike out "$725,000" and insert "$782,200," so as to read:

for drafting, clerical, inspection, and messenger service, $782,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 2, after the word "equipment," to strike out "$15,865,000" and insert "$16,500,000, including not to exceed $635,000 for the naval reserve," so as to read:

for new construction and procurement of aircraft and equipment, $16,500,000, including not to exceed $635,000 for the Naval Reserve, of which amount not to exceed $9,480,000 shall be available for the payment of obligations incurred under the contract authorization for these purposes carried in the Navy appropriation act for the fiscal year 1928, approved March 2, 1927; toward the construction of the rigid airships authorized in public act No. 422, Sixty-ninth Congress, approved June 24, 1926 (total limit of cost $8,000,000), $1,800,000, and the sum of $200,000 of the appropriation, "Aviation, Navy, 1928," toward the construction of one of such airships is hereby made available until June 30, 1929, toward the construction of two such rigid airships.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 1, after the words "in all," to change the total appropriation for "Aviation, Navy," from $31,315,000 to $32,072,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Marine Corps, pay, Marine Corps," on page 40, line 8, after the word "men," to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$243,684"; and in line 10, after the word "men," to strike out "$65,000; in all, $458,532" and insert "$87,500; in all, $574,716," so as to make the paragraph read:

For pay and allowances of the Marine Corps Reserve, (a) excluding transferred and assigned men, $243,684; (b) transferred men, $243,532; (c) assigned men, $87,500; in all, $574,716.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 14, after the words "In all," to change the total appropriation for pay of the Marine Corps from $15,633,816 to $15,750,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Printing and binding," on page 50, line 24, before the word "including," to strike out "$510,000" and insert "$520,000," so as to read:

For printing and binding for the Navy Department and the Naval Establishment executed at the Government Printing Office, $520,000, including not exceeding $85,000 for the Hydrographic Office and $2,800 for the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, to be inserted on page 35, line 10: "Irrespective of the date fixed in said act for the beginning of the construction of one of such airships."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 35, line 10, after the numerals "$8,000,000," it is proposed to insert:

irrespective of the date fixed in said act for the beginning of the construction of one of such airships.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, can I not induce the chairman of the committee to accept the second amendment I have offered, simply to go to conference? I ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 35, line 15, after the word "airships," it is proposed to insert:

if entered into with one contractor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to hear the Senator upon this amendment. It was considered by the committee, I will say, but the committee did not favor it. Personally, I can see no particular objection to it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, as I understand the situation—I am not a member of the Naval Affairs Committee—the bill authorizes the construction of two dirigibles, and it is assumed that two will be constructed. As has always been the custom, bids will be asked from concerns that are so equipped that they can build dirigibles. The New York Shipbuilding Co., located in New Jersey, now known as the American Brown-Boveri Co., are very anxious to put in a bid to build one or both of these dirigibles.

Under the terms of the bill, should the Navy Department award contracts for the two dirigibles to two different concerns, reserving the right, as they do, after awarding the contract, to cancel it as to one of the dirigibles, it is perfectly obvious that if any concern should get a contract, and it became necessary at once to build a hangar—which, I understand, costs approximately a million dollars—and then the Government should suddenly decide that they would wait and see what happened to the first dirigible, whether it was practical or whatever the reasons might be, and thus suspend operations on the construction of the second dirigible, the concern that had made the contract would simply be in the position of having expended a million dollars or thereabouts, and perhaps not have any completed order at all.

So that if we are going to follow the custom of getting bids from all those concerns equipped to construct these airships, it does seem to me that we should not make it absolutely essential that they give a contract for two airships to one concern. If this amendment is not adopted, as I understand, if the contract is given out, the two must be given to one concern, as another concern, I repeat, would not go to this expense unless they were sure the contract would be carried to its conclusion. We build battleships. We certainly have never followed the plan of giving the order for all battleships to one concern simply because we can get a number of battleships constructed more cheaply that way. No doubt we could. No doubt if one concern built all the battleships, the Government could save a very large sum just the same as if one concern built these two dirigibles. But that is not the policy of the Government. The policy of the Government is to encourage various plants to construct all these various innovations, and naturally a plant must have some assurance. In my judgment, this is a perfectly proper amendment, unless we want to say in advance that we propose to give this contract to one concern, and might save a few thousand dollars by so doing, and do not want to have any competition.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am much impressed by the argument put forth by the Senator from New Jersey. I felt in the committee that this should be done, and I hope that the amendment will be adopted, and that we will enter upon the course suggested by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. JONES. I would like to know what the amendment is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 35, line 15, after the word "airships," insert "if entered into with one contractor."

Mr. EDGE. The amendment in effect means that the Government reserves the right to cancel the order for the construction of one dirigible, providing the contract for both dirigibles is given to one concern. Should they be given to different concerns, which I have already discussed, and the opportunity to do which, it seems to me, should at least be offered, then we do not want the concern, whatever concern it may be, to be placed in a position where the Government could cancel the order after they have gone to a million-dollar expense preparing for the construction. That is the entire intent and effect of the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, Senators will realize that I am very much interested in the construction of dirigibles. I believe fully in the use of rigid dirigibles, especially for the Navy, though I do not believe in them for the Army. I believe over water they have a great advantage over any other form of aerial transportation that we have, though not so fast as airplanes. Over land they are not so advantageous.

Senators will remember that a few weeks ago I addressed the Senate on this subject and pointed out that in the last appropriation bill we had limited the number of airships that could be built to only one, that therefore we had not been able to make a contract at all, because no one was willing to contract to build an airship of the type desired by the Navy, and of the design accepted by the Navy, for the $4,000,000 limitation which had been placed upon it; but that it would be possible to get two built under the limit of $8,000,000, due to the fact that the hangar, which, as the Senator from New Jersey has said, will probably cost a million or a million a half, could be used for the construction of both ships.

Mr. Wilder, representing the Brown-Boveri Co., appeared before the committee at a hearing and asked for the insertion of the amendment which the Senator from New Jersey has offered. Upon being questioned, he stated that the reason for the amendment was in order that two ships might be constructed at the same time.

The House, in preparing this bill, has written into it some new legislation, which changes the five-year program as previously adopted by the Congress. That new legislation is found on page 35, line 14, beginning with the proviso, the word "Provided," and running to the end of the page. It provides that the Government has—the right of cancellation of the construction of the second airship if changed circumstances, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, shall suggest that course as being to the best interests of the Government, such right of cancellation to continue until the first airship shall have been tested in flight and accepted.

I appreciate the force of what the Senator from New Jersey has said with regard to the battleship building, the fact that it is always cheaper to get several built than one; but battleships and other ships on the ocean come under an entirely different heading, because they have been built for so many years that there is a certain standard accepted and known to be the best, which does not apply particularly in this country to the building of airships, because our experience in building airships has been extremely limited.

We have built a few airships, a very few. Most of them are merely "blimps," carrying two or three passengers. We have built one or two semirigids which will carry half a dozen passengers. We have built only one rigid dirigible, the Shenandoah, which was built for the Navy, and which met disaster in a tornado on a trip to the West some years ago.

There are a great many people who have felt that the disaster to the Shenandoah showed that we should not build rigid dirigibles at all; but we have finally persuaded the President to approve the suggestion, and the Budget has approved the idea, of making possible the securing of a contract for the building of two dirigibles, the total limit of cost to be $8,000,000, as provided for in the bill.

The committee felt that we did not want to proceed with the construction of two until we were certain about one. The Brown-Boveri Co. desires to have the bill amended in such form that there may be contracts for two, to proceed simultaneously, they maintaining that it would be to our advantage to have two different types constructed at the same time, one or both of which might be successful.

The company that knows most about the building of airships in this country has come to the conclusion, having had their design accepted by the Navy, that it would be impossible to construct a dirigible of the type desired by the Navy for $4,000,000; that the more likely estimate of cost of one would be $5,500,000.

It is quite obvious, if their judgment in the matter is correct, that if this amendment is carried and Congress gives its approval to the construction of the two dirigibles at the same time, the limit of cost of each dirigible will be $4,000,000. Those who have had the most experience in building dirigibles say that it can not be done for that sum, although Mr. Wilder, of the Brown-Boveri Co., thinks that one can be built for $4,000,000, and says that his company is willing to contract to build it for that sum. But those who know the most about it believe it can not be done for that amount.

At any rate, under the bill as it comes over from the House, the Government is protected to this extent, that if a dirigible is constructed and is not successful, we do not have to have another. Under the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, if the contract is divided between two parties, we must have two built. The proviso put in by the House would not apply.

The committee went into the matter very fully, and it is my recollection that almost with unanimity, there being only one or two votes opposed, the committee felt that the proviso was best as it stood, and that the amendment suggested by Mr. Wilder, and now offered by the Senator from New Jersey, was not advisable.

I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if he knows what was the cost of the building of the Shenandoah?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator will have to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I think it was about $2,500,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. That was a very much smaller ship, and cost about $2,500,000. It was built at the naval aircraft factory.

Mr. FRAZIER. The proposed ships are to be very much larger?

Mr. BINGHAM. Very much larger.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I can understand the arguments presented by the Senator from New Jersey, but I feel that the arguments presented by the Senator from Connecticut are more to the point, and should prevail in this matter. The committee went over the matter in great detail, and decided that the amendment was not a wise procedure.

The Navy Department advertised for bids some little time ago for these two airships, and several concerns answered the invitation for bids and submitted estimates and designs. From all of those that were submitted three were considered worthy of notice, and one design was selected from the three as being far superior in many particulars.

The Navy Department selected that design, and the concern that was the successful bidder has been working for some time on this design; and I feel that they would not be getting a fair deal if this amendment should prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments to be proposed as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have agreed not to have a vote on the bill this afternoon. So I ask that the bill be laid aside, and I give notice that I shall bring it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did the Senator say he had agreed to have it go over until to-morrow before a vote is taken?

Mr. HALE. A final vote. There are several Senators who desire to propose amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I submit an amendment to the pending naval appropriation bill, which I ask may be printed and lie upon the table. I shall bring it up early to-morrow morning when the appropriation bill is before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON'S amendment to House bill 12286, the naval appropriation bill, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 33, after line 6, to insert: "marine flying field and waterfront development, San Diego, Calif., $940,000."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On April 10, 1928:

S. 1498. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Chesapeake Bay, and to fix the location of said bridge; and

S. 2549. An act providing for payment to the German Government of $461.59 in behalf of the heirs or representatives of the German nationals John Adolf, Hermann Pegel, Franz Lipfert, Albert Wittenburg, Karl Nehr, and Hans Dechantsreiter.

On April 11, 1928:

S. 2301. An act to create a commission to be known as the Commission for the Enlarging of the Capitol Grounds, and for other purposes;

S. 3118. An act to authorize the construction of a temporary railroad bridge across Pearl River at a point in or near section 35, township 10 north, range 6 east, Leake County, Miss.; and

S. 3119. An act to authorize the construction of a temporary railroad bridge across Pearl River in Rankin County, Miss., and between Madison and Rankin Counties, Miss.

On April 12, 1928:

S. J. Res. 95. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to dispose of real property, located in Hernando County, Fla., known as the Brooksville Plant Introduction Garden, no longer required for plant-introduction purposes.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar until 3 o'clock. I think perhaps it would be better to begin where we left off the other day, if there is no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Where did we leave off?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With Order of Business 548.

Mr. CURTIS. If we start with that order of business and conclude the call of the calendar, we can go back to the beginning and go on with unobjected bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think none of the absent Senators knew that the calendar was to be taken up, and I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edge	La Follette	Simmons
Barkley	Fess	McKellar	Smith
Bayard	Fletcher	McLean	Smoot
Bingham	Frazier	McMaster	Steck
Black	Glass	McNary	Stelwer
Blaine	Goff	Metcalf	Stephens
Blease	Gooding	Moses	Swanson
Borah	Gould	Norbeck	Thomas
Bratton	Hale	Norris	Tydings
Brookhart	Harris	Oddie	Tyson
Broussard	Harrison	Overman	Vandenberg
Capper	Hawes	Pine	Wagner
Caraway	Hayden	Pittman	Warren
Copeland	Heflin	Ransdell	Waterman
Couzens	Johnson	Sackett	Watson
Curtis	Jones	Schall	Wheeler
Cutting	Kendrick	Sheppard
Deneen	Keyes	Shipstead
Dill	King	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

JOHN W. STOCKETT

The bill (S. 2319) for the relief of John W. Stockett was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to John W. Stockett, draftsman in the War Department, the sum of $142,500 in full compensation for royalty on the use by the United States Army of the Stockett breech mechanism upon guns, which device was duly covered by letters patent issued to the said John W. Stockett by the United States, to wit, Nos. 601176, 601177, 620259, 699256, and 705157.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LLOYD LAFOT

The bill (S. 362) to provide for the advancement on the retired list of the Navy of Lloyd Lafot was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike out the words "and such pay and allowances shall be paid from and after such date" and insert in lieu thereof the words "but no back pay or allowances shall accrue to said officer by reason of the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That Ensign Lloyd Lafot, United States Navy, retired, shall have the rank and receive the pay and allowances of a lieutenant (junior grade) on the retired list of the United States Navy. Such rank shall take effect on March 5, 1924, but no back pay or allowances shall accrue to said officer by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2532) to provide for the designation of clerks or employees of the Department of the Interior to serve as registers and receivers in the land offices in Alaska was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

NINA MACDONALD AND OTHERS

The bill (S. 2336) for the relief of Nina MacDonald, Zenas V. Johnston, Margaret E. Thompson, Arthur L. Beaman, May Fee, Willis E. Young, Daniel E. Turbeville, Clarence C. Spears, and Ina Mae Elkins was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$166.46" and insert in lieu thereof "$40.46"; on page 2, line 1, to strike out "$468.46" and insert in lieu thereof "$351.35"; in line 12, to strike out "$332.70" and insert in lieu thereof "$299.43"; to strike out lines 14 to 25, and on page 3, lines 1 to 3, in the following words: "Willis E. Young, late postmaster at Linnton, Oreg., in the sum of $541.51, due the United States by reason of expenditure of funds for extra clerical help not authorized by law; Daniel E. Turbeville, late postmaster at Turbeville, S. C., in the sum of $541.22, due the United States on account of loss of postal funds resulting from the failure of the Bank of Turbeville, S. C.; Clarence C. Spears, late postmaster at Giatto, W. Va., in the sum of $150,03, due the United States on account of loss of postal funds resulting from the failure of the First National Bank of Matoaka, W. Va.; Ina Mae Elkins, late postmaster at Polar, Tex., in the sum of $105.69, due the United States on account of the loss by burglary on the night of February 26, 1927, of postal funds in the above-stated sum," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Nina MacDonald, late postmaster at Sunland, Calif., in the sum of $40.46, due the United States on account of loss of postal funds resulting from loss of registered parcel containing $166.46, which loss occurred February 14, 1925; Zenas V. Johnston, late postmaster at Atwater, Minn., in the sum of $351.35, due the United States on account of loss of postal funds resulting from the failure of First National Bank of Atwater, Minn.; Margaret E. Thompson, late postmaster at Grey Eagle, Minn., in the sum of $47.52, due the United States on account of the loss of postal funds resulting from the failure of the First National Bank of Grey Eagle, Minn.; Arthur L. Beaman, late postmaster at Snow Hill, N. C., in the sum of $268.50, due the United States on account of loss of postal funds resulting from the failure of the Snow Hill Banking & Trust Co.; May Fee, late postmaster at Charbonneau, N. Dak., in the sum of $299.43, due the United States on account of the loss of postal funds resulting from the failure of the First National Bank at Fairview, Mont.: Provided, That the said late postmasters who have suffered loss through said bank failures shall assign to the United States any and all claims they may have to dividends arising from the liquidation of said banks.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Nina MacDonald, Zenas V. Johnston, Margaret E. Thompson, Arthur L. Beaman, and May Fee."

HALF HOLIDAYS FOR CERTAIN GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

The bill (S. 3116) providing for half holidays for certain Government employees was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the effective date of this act four hours, exclusive of time for luncheon, shall constitute a day's work on Saturdays through the year, with pay or earnings for the day the same as on other days when full time is worked, for all laborers, helpers, skilled and semiskilled workmen, and mechanics, exclusive of employees of the Postal Service and the Government Printing Office, employed by the Federal Government, whether on the hourly, per diem, per annum, piecework, or other basis: Provided, That in all cases where for special public reasons, to be determined by the head of the department or establishment having supervision or control of such employees, the services of such employees can not be spared, such employees shall be entitled to an equal shortening of the workday on some other day: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not deprive employees of any leave or holidays with pay to which they may now be entitled under existing laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2679) to limit the period for which an officer appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate may hold over after his term shall have expired was announced as next in order.

Mr. METCALF. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILL INDEFINITELY POSTPONED

The bill (S. 140) for the relief of Alpha Newell was announced as next in order. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs adversely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 728) to provide for the construction of works for the protection and development of the lower Colorado River Basin, for the approval of the Colorado River compact, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1263) to amend section 4 of the interstate commerce act was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 173) expressing it as the sense of the Senate that Andrew W. Mellon should resign as Secretary of the Treasury, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1748) relating to the qualifications of jurors in the Federal courts was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. I think some Senator who is not now here objected to the bill the other day. I shall ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ACQUISITION OF CANADIAN PROPERTIES BY WAR DEPARTMENT

The bill (S. 1738) for the validation of the acquisition of Canadian properties by the War Department and for relief of certain disbursing officers for payments made thereon was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the action by the War Department for the acquisition, through trustees, of an interest in and title to certain tracts of land on which to erect additional manufacturing buildings and facilities to increase the production of shells under contracts entered into with certain Canadian contractors for the manufacture of shells and other munitions during the World War is hereby ratified and validated, and that the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the following officers in the amounts stated which now stand as disallowances on the books of the General Accounting Office: Capt. J. Q. A. Brett, United States Army (now deceased), $207,223.66; Donald Findley, formerly captain, Ordnance Department, $14,510.39; Capt. Carl Halla, Finance Department (now major), $65,068.12; Maj. E. O. Hopkins, Quartermaster Corps (now major, Finance Department), $14,728.05; Weston Patterson, formerly first lieutenant, Finance Department, $13,960.16; in all, $315,490.38.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY ELLEN TIEFENTHALER

The bill (S. 2612) for the relief of Mary Ellen Tiefenthaler was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of Mary Ellen Tiefenthaler (formerly Eagin), administrator cum testamento annexo of Patrick Eagin, deceased, surviving partner of Connelly & Co., for the net proceeds of the cotton purchased or owned by them, taken by the United States officers, sold, and the net proceeds thereof placed in the United States Treasury, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for determination of the law and the facts, under the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L. 820), any statutes of limitations and section 179, Judicial Code, to the contrary notwithstanding, and report to Congress.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may we have a brief explanation of the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the bill grows out of the taking and selling of certain cotton by northern troops in North Carolina during the Civil War and the turning of the funds received therefrom into the Treasury of the United States. The bill refers the claimants to the Court of Claims to adjudicate their rights.

Mr. JONES. Was the committee report unanimous?

Mr. BAYARD. It was.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3151) to limit the jurisdiction of district courts of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. BRATTON. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question about the bill which was just passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to returning to Order of Business 634?

Mr. COPELAND. No, Mr. President; I do not want to return to it, but I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska what is his intention with regard to the bill and if it will be brought up for consideration at some time?

Mr. NORRIS. I beg the Senator's pardon; my attention was diverted for the moment and I did not hear his question.

Mr. COPELAND. Practically every member of the bar of New York City, judging from letters I have received, is opposed to the bill. I observe that there is a great deal of unanimity in objection to it. I want to know what is the intention of the Senator. Is he going to press the bill for passage at this time?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. It is a very important bill. I would hardly expect to pass it under unanimous consent, but I expect to try at least to get it up by motion before the session ends and hope to have the Senate act on it.

Mr. COPELAND. Was there a hearing on the bill and were those heard who are in opposition to it?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is a bill on which I think no particular hearings are necessary. It is entirely a legal proposition. If the Senator will read the report I think he will find it fairly discussed there.

Originally, when the first judicial act was passed it was provided that cases having in controversy an amount of $500 or more should come within the jurisdiction of the district court or what was the same as the district court, then called the circuit court, provided there should be diverse citizenship. That amount was afterwards changed to $2,000 and I think 10 or 12 years ago was changed to $3,000. There are other cases involved besides diversity of citizenship in the bill. The bill goes still further and removes the limitation as far as amount is concerned so that the Federal district court would not have jurisdiction in diversity of citizenship cases.

Mr. COPELAND. In view of the fact that there were no hearings and no one appeared before the committee in opposition to the bill, and in view of the fact that it develops that there are many members of the bar who are in opposition, may I ask the Senator why it would not be a good idea to have the bill recommitted to the committee in order that those objections might be raised?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should not have had any objection to anybody being heard, but it is purely a question of practice that the lawyers on the Judiciary Committee understand as well as do other attorneys. In a general way the class of attorneys who will object to this proposed legislation will be attorneys for railroad companies, insurance companies, and other big corporations whose business takes them into several different States. At the present time I might in my town, together with a few of my neighbors, organize a corporation; we could incorporate in the State of Delaware; but in the State of Nebraska we would have our business, our property; all of the stockholders and everything else would be there. If we wanted to sue a man across the street we could go into a United States court or we could go into the State court, but anybody else doing business there, not incorporated in a foreign State, would have to go into the State court.

Mr. FLETCHER. And if such a corporation were sued in a State court it could move the case to the Federal court.

Mr. NORRIS. The suit could be removed to the Federal court on account of diversity of citizenship.

The only excuse and the only reason of which I know that has ever been given for the present practice is prejudice in one State against the citizens of another State, and the litigants go into a Federal court in order to avoid that prejudice. If such a condition existed 150 years ago, it has certainly disappeared now; there is not anything to it; it is entirely a fiction, as I look at it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this bill can not be disposed of to-day, and that it will take some time, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has said, being a matter of considerable importance, why not let the bill go over to-day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Idaho that the bill has been passed over, and all of the debate which has been since proceeding is out of order.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

RECOVERY OF ILLEGALLY COLLECTED DIRECT TAXES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the clerk inadvertently omitted to announce Order of Business 616, being Senate Joint Resolution 28, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 28) consenting that certain States may sue the United States, and providing for trial on the merits in any suit brought hereunder by a State to recover direct taxes alleged to have been illegally collected by the United States during the years 1866, 1867, and 1868, and vesting the right in each State to sue in its own name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to make a further observation in relation to the bill we have just been discussing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York object to the present consideration of the joint resolution the title of which has just been stated?

Mr. COPELAND. I reserve the right to object. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska, but I will reserve my remarks for a few moments.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Whereas the United States, under various acts of Congress, levied a tax against all kinds of manufactured goods and raw material, and collected it from many citizens, partnerships, and corporations in various States during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1866, 1867, and 1868; and

Whereas it was then and has ever since been contended by many citizens that said taxes were levied in violation of the Federal Constitution because, as they alleged, they were direct taxes and were not apportioned among the States according to population as required by Article I, section 2, of the said Constitution; and

Whereas legislatures of many States have passed acts authorizing and directing their governors to propound to the United States their claims to all moneys heretofore illegally collected and covered into the Federal Treasury as a direct tax upon property situated in said States: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the United States consents that suits to recover taxes hereafter mentioned may be brought against it and heard and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States by any and every State which has passed, or which within four years hereafter passes, an act authorizing and directing its governor or other representative to propound to the United States its claims for moneys alleged to have been heretofore illegally collected and covered into the Treasury of the United States as a direct tax during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1866, 1867, and 1868, upon property situated in each of said States, and providing for the repaying to the original taxpayers or their legal representatives, where payment and ownership has been properly established, and also providing for escheat to the State after a period of not less than two years from the time the moneys herein referred to shall have been received by the State;

That the right of action to recover in the Supreme Court of the United States moneys alleged to have been illegally collected and covered into the Federal Treasury as direct taxes during the years before mentioned is hereby vested in each State in which such direct taxes were paid, and which has passed or shall pass an act authorizing such suit to be brought as above provided;

That the United States shall contest such claims solely upon the ground of the legality of said tax, other defenses being hereby waived; and if the court shall decide that said taxes were illegally collected, the United States shall defend such suit or suits no further than for the purpose of determining the amounts of taxes collected in the respective States which may institute suit hereunder, provided no interest shall be allowed.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I inquire what disposition was made of Order of Business 621, being the bill (S. 1748) relating to the qualifications of jurors in the Federal courts? Was objection made to the consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill went over.

The clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

MARGARET DIEDERICH

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3280) for the relief of Margaret Diederich, which was read. It proposes to pay to Margaret Diederich, widow of the late Henry W. Diederich, late Foreign Service officer of the United States, retired, and formerly American consul at Leipzig, Germany; Magdeburg, Germany; Bremen, Germany; consul general at Antwerp, Belgium; and consul at Sarnia, Ontario, Canada, $3,000, being one year's salary of her deceased husband.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object to the consideration of the bill, I desire to say that I am advised by the attorneys who have spoken to me that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court feels that the bill is not a good bill in some respects. I am not competent, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] knows, to discuss this matter from the legal standpoint; but, since there is a difference of opinion among lawyers regarding it, I do believe that the bill should be recommitted in order that those interested may present at first hand what objections they have to it. I would not be competent, of course, to reflect their criticisms and to express their views here, but I do think the bill should go back to the committee, in order that persons who are competent to discuss it may be heard.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while there were no hearings held on the bill, there was no unseemly haste about its consideration. The bill was introduced, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and was there quite a while, as the Senator can ascertain by looking at the bill itself. It was quite a long while after it was introduced before the bill was taken up in the Committee on the Judiciary, and referred to a subcommittee. That subcommittee considered the bill, went over it, and unanimously recommended to the full committee that the bill be passed. The bill was taken up in the full committee; it was discussed; and there was only one vote against it in the full committee. If there was some question of fact or some doubt as to the object of the bill, or something of that kind, the situation would be different; but if the Judiciary Committee appointed a subcommittee and had hearings on all of the legal questions submitted to it, it never would be able to "get to first base" with any of its business.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. The bill to which the Senator from Nebraska has been addressing his remarks has been passed over.

Mr. NORRIS. I am discussing another bill, and, until my five minutes are up, I am in order in doing so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is in order.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Virginia does not seem to be able to discern that I am discussing another bill. I myself will not try to tell the Senator just what the bill I am discussing is, but it is another bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will inform the Senator from Nebraska that it is my bill he is discussing.

Mr. NORRIS. That makes me feel all the better about it, Mr. President.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire as a matter of information whether Calendar No. 634, being Senate bill 3151, was passed over or passed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill referred to by the Senator from Florida was passed over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, it has not been considered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

POTOMAC RIVER BRIDGE AT GREAT FALLS

The bill (H. R. 9830) authorizing the Great Falls Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Great Falls was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that I have not as yet had a promise from the Senator from Nebraska that he would permit the gentlemen who are in opposition to the bill which has been under discussion to be heard. Why not leave the bill on the calendar, as in a similar case the other day, and invite those in opposition before the committee in order that they may present their objections?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will take a list of the committee—I do not have one here before me—and consider that each member serves on a number of subcommittees, he will find that each member of that committee, with the exception of some who have been sick and some who have asked to be relieved from service on account of other work, has as high as 15 or 16 bills submitted to him on account of his service on various subcommittees. If anyone who objects to the bill will write a brief or a letter or a statement either to the Senator from New York or to me or to the clerk of the committee, I will submit it to the committee, or the Senator can have it published in the RECORD. I do not want to shut anybody off from any proper discussion of the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator, and I will undertake to get a brief which will be presented to the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I will be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. COPELAND. I am obliged to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of House bill 9830?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9830) authorizing the Great Falls Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Great Falls.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that on March 30, 1928, the Senator from Nebraska offered an amendment to the bill to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not press the amendment. The bill now before the Senate provides for building a bridge across the Potomac River at Great Falls. It will not interfere with any development of Great Falls for any purpose whatever. The bill is in the usual form; everyone, so far as I know, favors it, and it affords the only chance which has been given for years to secure communication between Maryland and Virginia at that point.

The Senator is the author of an amendment which has in view the development of Great Falls as a water-power proposition. I have always voted with him in the Senate on that measure; I agree with him as to its desirability, and I have helped him on former occasions to get his bill through the Senate, but the House will not vote for it. He wishes to attach the amendment on this bill so that he may endeavor to secure support in the House for his proposal and to secure a vote on it. The bill now before the Senate is a minor bill. There is nobody interested except a portion of Maryland and a portion of Virginia; only four Senators are interested in it, and only about two Members of the House of Representatives.

I am satisfied that if the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska were adopted it would not advance his proposal at all, which, as I have said, I earnestly favor, but would immediately result in killing this bill. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will be kind enough to recognize that fact, and I appeal to him to withdraw his amendment and let this bill pass, for, as I understand, the Senator from Nebraska does not object to the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, whether there is any prospect of the bill for the development of Great Falls being reported either favorably or adversely? That bill is now pending before the District Committee. It is in the same terms practically as the amendment which I have offered to the pending bridge bill.

Mr. CAPPER. I think the prospect is rather doubtful, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as a member of the District Committee, I may say to the Senator from Nebraska that I will insist upon a report from the committee on the bill to which he has referred.

Mr. NORRIS. That is an assurance that I want to rely on, and I am going to rely on it, and because both Senators from Virginia are very anxious that this bridge bill shall be passed, and because they have convinced me that the effect of the amendment will be, perhaps, to kill the bill in the other House, I am going to heed the appeal.

Both Senators from Virginia are favorable to the development of Great Falls, and have always assisted in legislation having that object in view. We have passed such bills through the Senate three, and I am not sure but four, different times, and I want to accomplish its passage again and, if possible, its enactment. I do not wish, however, to interfere with the pending bridge bill, and with the assurance of the Senator from Virginia I am going to withdraw the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. SWANSON. In addition to what has already been said, I will say that I will move to discharge the committee from the consideration of the Great Falls bill to which the Senator from Nebraska has referred if the committee shall not report it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK

The bill (H. R. 9495) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, with regard to the bill the title of which has just been stated, I will say that several Senators, in addition to myself, would like to have an amendment placed on it which will require quite a little consideration. Inasmuch as it can not properly be considered under the five-minute rule, I will have to ask that the bill go over until such time as the Senator from Kansas, if he will do so, may have it brought before the Senate in such a way that we will have an opportunity for general discussion of the proposed amendment.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, this bill corresponds with Senate bill 1285, which has been at the head of the calendar for nearly two months. Many Senators are inquiring of me why there has been no action on this bill for the completion of the agricultural extension program. I think the Senator from Delaware will agree with me that I have not been disposed to prevent full consideration of the issues raised by him.

I wish to say now that I will make an effort at the first possible opportunity to have the bill brought before the Senate in a way that will give the Senator from Delaware and others an opportunity to present their objections to certain features of the bill with a view to securing final action on this important measure at an early date.

Mr. BAYARD. I suggest to the Senator that he apply to the steering committee and see if an arrangement can not be made for the consideration of the bill. It ought not to take very long, but the time afforded under the five-minute rule will be wholly insufficient to discuss the merits of my proposed amendment.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr President, the matter has been taken up with the steering committee, but the situation with regard to the business of the Senate is so pressing that it is hoped, the opposition being limited to the Senator from Delaware and one or two others, by making the motion to consider the bill and giving the Senator a half an hour or so to express his opposition, it can be considered and passed, or at least some action be taken upon it without the necessity of putting it away down on the steering committee's list. It seems that it will be almost impossible to reach all the bills that are now on that list.

Mr. BAYARD. I am just as sorry as the Senator from Kentucky is about that; but I think this amendment is a very vital one.

Mr. SACKETT. It is.

Mr. BAYARD. And I think it should receive full discussion on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SACKETT. To be sure; but does not the Senator think we could get it up on the floor and get through with it in a couple of hours?

Mr. BAYARD. I could get through in an hour.

Mr. SACKETT. That would be very satisfactory. I suggest that the Senator set an hour for its coming up. Under Rule VIII, the Senator can make a motion to take it up.

Mr. BAYARD. Upon notice, so that I can have my papers here, that will be very agreeable.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator that it is my intention to ask for several adjournments next week, so that we may take up bills by motion during the morning hour.

Mr. CAPPER. In the light of that statement, I give notice that I shall take advantage of the first opportunity to move for consideration of the agricultural extension bill under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ADDITIONAL LAND OFFICES

The bill (S. 1794) establishing additional land offices in the States of Montana, Oregon, Idaho, and South Dakota was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 3, after line 10, to insert:

That all that portion of the State of Nevada included within the former boundaries of the land district created by the act entitled "An act to create an additional land district in the State of Nevada," approved October 3, 1913, is hereby constituted a new land district, and that the land office for said district shall be located at Elko, in the county of Elko."

On the same page, line 18, to change the number of the section from 8 to 9; and, after line 24, to insert:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause all plats, maps, records, and papers which relate to or form a necessary part of the records of the lands embraced in the land districts hereby constituted in the States of Montana, Oregon, South Dakota, Idaho, and Nevada to be transferred to the land offices in such land districts from the land offices in such States having jurisdiction over such plats, maps, records, and papers on the date of the approval of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all that portion of the State of Montana included within the present boundaries of Beaverhead, Broadwater, Deer Lodge, Gallatin, Granite, Jefferson, Lake, Lewis and Clark, Madison, Mineral, Missoula, Park, Powell, Ravalli, Sanders, and Silver Bow Counties is hereby constituted a new land district and that the land office for said district shall be located at Helena, in the county of Lewis and Clark.

SEC. 5. That all that portion of the State of Oregon included within the present boundaries of Union, Baker, Grant, Morrow, Umatilla, and Wallowa Counties is hereby constituted a new land district and that the land office for said district shall be located at La Grande, in the county of Union.

SEC. 6. That all that portion of the State of South Dakota included within the present boundaries of Harding, Butte, Lawrence, Meade, Pennington, Jackson, Custer, Washington, Washabaugh, Fall River, Shannon, and Bennett Counties is hereby constituted a new land district and that the land office for said district shall be located at Rapid City, in the county of Pennington.

SEC. 7. That all that portion of the State of Idaho included within the present boundaries of Blaine, Camas, Gooding, Jerome, Twin Falls, Cassia, Minidoka, and Lincoln Counties is hereby constituted a new land district and that the land office for said district shall be located at Hailey, in the county of Blaine.

SEC. 8. That all that portion of the State of Nevada included within the former boundaries of the land district created by the act entitled "An act to create an additional land district in the State of Nevada," approved October 3, 1913, is hereby constituted a new land district and that the land office for said district shall be located at Elko, in the county of Elko.

SEC. 9. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized to appoint a register for each of the additional land offices established under the provisions of this act, who shall discharge the duties of said office and receive the same amount of compensation as other officers discharging like duties in the other land offices of the respective States.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause all plats, maps, records, and papers which relate to or form a necessary part of the records of the lands embraced in the land districts hereby constituted in the States of Montana, Oregon, South Dakota, Idaho, and Nevada to be transferred to the land offices in such land districts from the land offices in such States having jurisdiction over such plats, maps, records, and papers on the date of the approval of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WATERMAN. Mr. President, I object to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over, under objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

VALIDATION OF APPLICATIONS FOR AND ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS

The bill (H. R. 11020) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 4, after line 19, to insert:

Homestead entry, Santa Fe, N. Mex., No. 051006, made by Adie G. McAllister on April 14, 1922, under section 1 of the stock raising homestead act for all of section 12, township 2 north, range 17 east, New Mexico principal meridian.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 11, to insert:

SEC. 11. That desert-land entry, Sacramento, Calif., No. 020160, made by Daniel M. Nicoll on July 21, 1919, and assigned to Thomas D. Devine, of Long Pine, Calif., on September 20, 1922, embracing lots 11 and 12, southwest quarter of northeast quarter and southeast quarter of northwest quarter, section 4, township 16 south, range 35 east, Mount Diablo meridian, containing an area of 136.09 acres, be, and the same is hereby, validated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CABAZON WATER CO.

The bill (H. R. 5687) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain public lands to the Cabazon Water Co., issue patent therefor, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 10885) to amend sections 23 and 24 of the general leasing act approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. L. 437), was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING. Let us have some explanation of that bill, Mr. President, or else let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

FARMERS' MARKET IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 3774) to provide a temporary location for a farmers' market in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 1, line 9, after the word "authorized," to strike out "an appropriation of" and insert "to be appropriated"; and in line 11, after the word "space," to insert "construction of temporary roadway, provision of necessary facilities, and other expenses necessary in the judgment of the commissioners," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to use the sidewalk and parking south of the south curb line of B Street NW., between Sixth and Ninth Streets, for use as a temporary market to replace the farmers' market now located in the territory bounded by Tenth, Twelfth, B, and Little B Streets NW., and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $35,000 for the erection of temporary shelters over said space, construction of temporary roadway, provision of necessary facilities, and other expenses necessary in the judgment of the commissioners, payable as other expenses of the government of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to establish a scale of rentals to be paid for said space by farmers using said space under such regulations as said commissioners may deem advisable.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN ARKANSAS

The bill (S. 3338) authorizing the sale of certain lands on Petit Jean Mountain near Morrilton, Ark., for use by the Young Men's Christian Association of Arkansas was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the word "the," to insert "State executive committee of the"; in line 8, after the word "camp," to strike out "Approximately the south half of the north half of" and insert "The south half of the northeast quarter, southeast quarter of the northwest quarter and lot 4"; and on page 2, line 1, after the word "Arkansas," to insert "containing 168.97 acres," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon payment therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent for the following-described lands to the State executive committee of the Young Men's Christian Association of Arkansas for use by the said association for a camp. The south half of the northeast quarter, southeast quarter of the northwest quarter and lot 4, section 31, in township 6 north, range 17 west, county of Conway, State of Arkansas, containing 168.97 acres: Provided, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, or other minerals in the land, and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 3602) to quiet title and possession with respect to certain lands in Faulkner County, Ark., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the word "west," to strike out "as surveyed by J. H. Hall, county surveyor, Faulkner County, Ark., on November 7, 1927," and insert "fifth principal meridian, Arkansas, according to the official plat thereof dated April, 1819," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the lands situated in Faulkner County, Ark., described as follows: The south half southwest quarter section 36, township 7 north, range 13 west, fifth principal meridian, Arkansas, according to the official plat thereof dated April, 1819, be, and the same are hereby, granted, released, and relinquished by the United States in fee simple to the respective owner or owners of the equitable title and to their heirs and assigns forever, as freely and completely, in every respect whatever, as could be done by patents issued therefor according to law.

SEC. 2. Nothing in this act shall in any manner abridge, divest, impair, injure, or prejudice any valid right, title, or interest of any person or persons in or to any portion or part of the lands mentioned in the said first section, the true intent of this act being to relinquish and abandon, grant, give, and concede any and all right, interest, and estate, in law or equity, which the United States is or is supposed to be entitled to in said lands, in favor of all persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the true and lawful owners of the same under the laws of the State of Arkansas, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of the said interest and estate of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. S. WINANS

The bill (H. R. 8650) for the relief of C. S. Winans was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to call the especial attention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] to the wording of this bill. I have no objection to it. It reads:

That the General Accounting Office be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of C. S. Winans, United States consul at Prague, Czechoslovakia, in the sum of $10,000, due to the United States on account of consular fees, which represented funds in said amount regularly mailed to the State Department by said Winans in November, 1920, and stolen while in the course of transmission through official pouch.

I merely desire to call the attention of the two Senators named to this bill because it is another case where money sent through the mails—through the official pouch now—is being restored; and I think it ought to be restored, I will say to the Senators.

Mr. BAYARD. This was really the Government's money, was it not—the money of an official of the Government? He was chargeable with it?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but the man was liable for it.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a totally different case from the case the Senator had down in his own State.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it is an entirely similar case.

Mr. BAYARD. I am sorry that I can not see eye to eye with the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is an entirely similar case, in that the officer was responsible for the money, his bondsmen were responsible for it and should have paid it to the Government and no doubt did pay it to the Government, and now it is being restored because it was stolen from the mails. That is the principle that I asked to have applied in the other case.

Mr. BAYARD. Of course, the Senator recognizes the fact that this report was not made by the Claims Committee but by the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true; but I hoped that it might be persuasive with the Senators who have taken such an active hand in opposing another claim involving an exactly similar principle.

Mr. FLETCHER. This bill does not propose to pay this man the money, as I understand. It simply relieves him of the liability.

Mr. McKELLAR. It relieves him of the liability, which is exactly the same thing.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD S. LATHROP

The bill (H. R. 6360) for the relief of Edward S. Lathrop was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIDOWS OF CERTAIN FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS

The bill (H. R. 10932) for the relief of the widows of certain Foreign Service officers was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAURICE P. DUNLAP

The bill (H. R. 9411) for the relief of Maurice P. Dunlap was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300 to Maurice P. Dunlap, American consul, for reimbursement in full for losses sustained in aiding relatives of an American citizen residing in Russia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

LAND-GRANT RAILROAD IN OREGON AND CALIFORNIA

The bill (S. 3699) for the relief of the land-grant railroad operated between the station formerly known as East Portland, in the State of Oregon, and Roseville, in the State of California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the land-grant railroad heretofore operated, and now being operated, between the station formerly known as East Portland, in the State of Oregon, and Roseville, in the State of California, shall hereafter receive the same compensation for transportation of property and troops of the United States as is paid to land-grant railroads organized under the land grant act of March 3, 1863, and the act of July 27, 1866 (ch. 278).

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 8651) for the relief of Lynn W. Franklin was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call the attention of the same two Senators to this second bill in to-day's proceedings, where money lost in the mails is being refunded by the Government.

Mr. WATERMAN. I object to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2505) granting increase of pension under the general law to soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and their dependents, for disability incurred in line of duty, and authorizing that the records of the War and Navy Departments be accepted as to incurrence of a disability in service in line of duty was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 25) to declare the 11th day of November, celebrated and known as Armistice Day, a legal holiday was announced as next in order.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

BRIDGE ACROSS EMORY RIVER AT SUDDATHS FERRY, TENN.

The bill (S. 3571) granting the consent of Congress to the county court of Roane County, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Emory River, at Suddaths Ferry, in Roane County, Tenn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county court of Roane County, Tenn., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Emory River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Suddaths Ferry, in Roane County, Tenn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1729) extending the classified civil service to include postmasters of the third class, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CONVENTION OF UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS

The bill (H. R. 7908) to authorize the granting of leave to veterans of the Spanish-American War to attend the annual convention of the United Spanish War Veterans and auxiliary in Habana, Cuba, in 1928 was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CODE

The bill (S. 2804) to amend section 812 of an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," as amended, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 812 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended by striking out the entire section and substituting in lieu thereof the following:

"Whoever unlawfully and forcibly or fraudulently decoys or seizes or carries off any person against his or her will or against the will of the parent, guardian, or legal custodian of such person, with intent to hold, confine, or imprison such person within the District, or with the intention of carrying or having such person carried out of the District, shall be imprisoned for not less than 1 year or more than 20 years, or fined not to exceed $5,000, or both: Provided, That whoever shall unlawfully and forcibly or fraudulently seize and hold, confine, or imprison within the District or take, carry, or send, or cause to be taken, carried, or sent out of the District, any person against his or her will or against the will of the parent, guardian, or legal custodian of such person for the purpose of extorting ransom or money or other valuable thing or concession from such person, his or her parent, guardian, or legal custodian, or any other person, firm, or corporation, shall be punished by imprisonment for life or for a term not less than five years."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE RESERVATIONS

The bill (S. 2019) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations, and to increase the efficiency of the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1926, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "lease," to insert "for such period or periods as may be authorized by the Secretary of Commerce," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 6 of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations, and to increase the efficiency of the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1926, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows:

"The city may lease, for such period or periods as may be authorized by the Secretary of Commerce, for cottage purposes only, a strip of land extending back 150 feet from the high-water mark along the entire frontage on the Atlantic Ocean of the lands herein authorized to be conveyed, on the condition that all revenues derived from any lease herein authorized shall be expended solely for the purpose of developing the remainder of such lands for public-park purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, MONTANA

The bill (S. 1964) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Montana as an auxiliary to the Bozeman (Mont.) fisheries station was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established at a point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce an auxiliary fish-cultural station in the State of Montana for the propagation of the fishes indigenous to that region as a subsidiary to the Bozeman, Mont., fisheries station, to be under the direction of the Bureau of Fisheries, Department of Commerce, and there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $35,000 for this purpose, including the construction of buildings and ponds, water supply, and for equipment.

SEC. 2. That in connection with the establishment of such fish-cultural station there is authorized the following personnel, namely: One foreman, at $1,500 per annum; two apprentice fish-culturists, at $900 per annum.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I notice a number of measures of this character, some carrying much larger appropriations than others. May I ask the chairman of the committee what is the basis of the establishment of these fish hatcheries? Is there any limitation upon the number, and is there any limitation upon the amount to be appropriated?

Mr. JONES. The usual amount authorized for these fish-hatchery stations is $50,000. In some of them the original bill had $100,000, but the committee has amended it to $50,000. That has been the usual amount authorized to start a fish hatchery. There are some here that are substations or auxiliary stations, and not original stations, where the amount is less. I think we have provided $35,000 in such a case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISHERIES EXPERIMENT STATON, WASHINGTON

The bill (S. 745) to authorize the establishment of a fisheries experiment station on the west coast of Washington was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, line 5, after the numerals "$100,000," to insert the words "which sum is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That to aid in acquiring and diffusing among fishermen and those engaged in the fishery industries useful and practical information connected with the fisheries, the method of capture of fishes, the handling, curing, and preparing of fishery products, and the methods of utilizing fishery products heretofore unutilized or wasted, and to conduct scientific investigations and experiments respecting the principles and application of science in relation to the fisheries, the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to establish a fisheries experiment station on a site to be selected by him on the coast of Washington: Provided, That the cost of said station, including the site, buildings, wharves, and other structures appertaining thereto, shall not exceed $100,000, which sum is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-HATCHING STATION, IDAHO

The bill (S. 1261) to establish a fish-hatching and fish-cultural station in the State of Idaho was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the word "hereby," to insert the words "authorized to be," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $50,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the establishment of a fish-hatching and fish-cultural station, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, in the State of Idaho, at a suitable point to be designated by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish-hatching and fish-cultural station in accordance with this act the State of Idaho through appropriate legislative action shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and fish culture and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That the operations of said hatchery shall be discontinued whenever the State ceases to accord the right referred to in the preceding proviso, and may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fish cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSERVATION OF FISH

The bill (S. 3437) to provide for the conservation of fish, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, to strike out "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Department of Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to study, investigate, and determine the best means and methods of preventing the destruction of fish by ditches, canals, and other works constructed by the United States, under the Interior Department; and for this purpose such sums of money as may be necessary, not exceeding in the aggregate $25,000 are hereby authorized to be expended out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-HATCHING STATION, NEW MEXICO

The bill (S. 721) to establish a fish-hatching and fish-cultural station in the State of New Mexico was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "$75,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000"; and on line 4, after the word "hereby," to insert the words "authorized to be," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the establishment of a fish-hatching and fish-cultural station, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, in the State of New Mexico, at a suitable point to be designated by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That before any final steps shall be taken for the construction of a fish-hatching and fish-cultural station in accordance with this act, the State of New Mexico, through appropriate legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and fish culture and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time they may consider necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That the operations of said hatchery shall be discontinued whenever the State ceases to accord the right referred to in the preceding proviso.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COAST GUARD OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN

The bill (H. R. 11022) to extend medical and hospital relief to retired officers and enlisted men of the United States Coast Guard was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over. I would like to examine it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, did the Senator notice the report? I think a reading of that will make it clear. It states that—

The officers and enlisted men of the Coast Guard while on active duty receive medical attention and hospitalization from the Public Health Service. However, as soon as an officer or enlisted man is retired from active duty, either because of physical disability in line of duty or incident to service, or after having served the Government faithfully and honorably for the greater portion of his life, the Public Health Service is at present without the necessary legislative authority to extend him, in his retired status, the facilities of the marine hospitals or out-patient offices under the jurisdiction of that service. This bill, if enacted into law, will permit the extension to these retired officers and enlisted men of a privilege to which they are justly entitled, a right analagous to that accorded to retired officers and enlisted men of the Navy at naval hospitals and dispensaries. There is a pressing need for this proposed legislation, and the department urges its passage as a meritorious measure.

I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KING. I want to look into it a little further. It seems to me that pretty soon we shall be asked to provide retirement privileges or hospital services for every employee of the Government. I do not know where we are going to draw the line. First it is the Coast Guard, then would come the Lighthouse Service, then persons in the customs service, and all down the line. I see no place where we are to stop.

Mr. JONES. The Coast Guard is substantially a part of the Navy, and in the event of war it has become a part of the Navy, and it has always been treated in the same way.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that we will be able to draw the line.

Mr. JONES. I hope the Senator will look into it very carefully.

Mr. KING. I shall do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. I believe that if the Senator will examine the report, he will be satisfied that this is a very meritorious measure and ought to pass.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

OKANOGAN COUNTY, WASH.

The bill (H. R. 431) to authorize the payment of certain taxes to Okanogan County, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of the bill. We have had a number of such cases where counties have come to the Federal Government for the payment of taxes that have been levied and have not been paid.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator that the bill deals with this county just as Congress has already dealt with the two adjoining counties in the State. It grows out of the situation with reference to the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation in our State. Back in the year 1892 we passed legislation under which a certain sum of money was put into a special fund in the Treasury, and it was provided that, so long as certain lands had been allotted to the Indians, and taxes had been accruing, the Secretary was authorized to take care of the proportionate sum in taxes. But after a few years this money, without action by Congress, was diverted into the Treasury, and, as I said, Congress passed legislation of this kind, after a very careful consideration, and after a survey and investigation pursuant to a resolution passed by Congress.

Upon a report of the committee Congress passed legislation similar to this dealing with Stevens and Ferry Counties, just adjoining this county. That legislation was passed, approved by the President, we have appropriated the money and paid it to these two counties, and this is simply to accord the same treatment to this county that was accorded to those two counties under the same conditions and circumstances.

Mr. KING. I am not sure now that I understand all the reasons justifying the appropriation by the Federal Government to meet taxes which are imposed.

Mr. JONES. I have not given all the reasons in detail.

Mr. KING. I received several letters quite recently from Indians who had obtained patents from the Government for their lands, or at least had received final receipts. They claim that they understood, in their dealings with the Government, that their property was to be immune from taxation. The State government, however, has proceeded to tax their property and some of it has been sold, and, as I understood one of the letters, tax deeds had been given to the purchasers of some of the land sold, and the Indians are now without property.

Mr. JONES. The bill does not affect the rights of the Indians. That is covered substantially by this paragraph in the report:

The moneys set apart in the Treasury of the United States under the provisions of section 2 of the act of July 1, 1892, belonged to the United States, and not to the Colville Indians. It was public funds arising from the sale of lands in the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation which had been restored to the public domain by the said act of July 1, 1892. Under the provisions of section 2 of said act the moneys so set apart constituted a fund out of which the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to pay "such part of the local taxation as may be properly applied to the lands allotted to such Indians, as he shall think fit, so long as such alloted lands shall be held in trust and exempt from taxation."

The allotments of lands were made to the Indians in 1900 and trust patents for the period of 25 years were issued therefor. The allotted lands were exempt from taxation during the period of the trust patents, except in occasional instances where the allotted Indians asked for and received patents in fee.

Then, as I have said, in the adjustment with reference to these lands under the same conditions it was found some four or five years ago that there was due to the counties of Ferry and Stevens a certain amount, and Congress authorized that to be paid. This deals with Okanogan County in exactly the same way. It does not affect the Indians at all.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I understand the Senator yet. I do not say it by way of criticism, but I do not see how he can make the statement that it does not affect the Indians. As I understand him, their property has been taxed.

Mr. JONES. No; the Senator is mistaken. The Indians' property has not been taxed, but we provided in the law passed in 1892 that where certain of these lands were allotted to the Indians proportionately, then the county should be reimbursed for the tax that otherwise would accrue for these lands, but the Indians did not have to pay it. The county was deprived of it by the action taken in 1892.

Mr. KING. It simply means, then, that the Indians' lands are taxed.

Mr. JONES. No; it does not tax the Indians' lands at all.

Mr. KING. Somebody has to pay taxes upon lands which are allotted to the Indians.

Mr. JONES. This is an executive reservation, and under the act of 1892 it was recognized that these lands, or a part of them allotted to the Indians that might otherwise have been subject to taxation, were thereby taken away from the tax list, and that the counties were entitled to the proportionate part of the taxes.

Mr. KING. Why should a county or a State be entitled to taxes upon lands which are acquired by the Government for military purposes, acquired for the Indians, or for any other purpose coming within the cognizance of the Federal Government?

Mr. JONES. I am not prepared to say just what the reasons were that led to the enactment of the law of 1892, but that was a provision of that law, and it was in pursuance of that and in accordance with that that we passed an act four or five years ago dealing with these other two counties. They have gotten their part, and it seems but fair and right that this other county should be included under exactly the same conditions, under the act of 1892. Whatever may have been the reason for that, whatever may have been the justice or merits of it, it was passed, and this is simply to carry that out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Washington has expired.

Mr. KING. I shall not object to this bill, but I confess that to me the principle does not seem fair or just. I think the Committee on Indian Affairs should look into this matter.

Mr. JONES. It has been gone into very carefully.

Mr. KING. If the Government is to be required to pay taxes upon all lands which may be withdrawn legitimately and properly for governmental purposes, I do not know where the end will be. We might just as well say that the lands that the Government acquires here for public purposes, or acquires in Boise or in Seattle for public buildings, shall be taxed.

Mr. JONES. I do not think there is another case similar to this in all the country. At least, I have never heard of one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOREIGN TRADE ZONES

The bill (S. 742) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. This bill can not be acted upon in the time we have before 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RECOGNITION OF HEROIC CONDUCT

The bill (S. 1609) recognizing the heroic conduct, devotion to duty, and skill on the part of the officers and crews of the U. S. S. Republic, American Trader, President Roosevelt, President Harding, and the British steamship Cameronia, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the term "crew" as used in this act shall mean and include any person carried on the ship's register or serving on the ship in any capacity, regardless of rank or rating, at the time of the rescue referred to in this act.

SEC. 2. That the thanks and appreciation of the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, tendered to the families of Uno Wirteman and Fritz Steger who lost their lives, and to the officers and crew of the U. S. S. President Roosevelt as constituted on January 24 to 28, 1926, inclusive, for the heroic conduct shown and noble service rendered in the rescue of the officers and crew of the British steamship Antinoe; and to the officers and crew of the U. S. S. President Harding as constituted on October 25, 1925, for the heroic conduct shown and noble service rendered in the rescue of the officers and crew of the Italian steamship Ignacio Florio; to the officers and crew of the steamship American Trader, of the American Merchant Line, as constituted on October 26, 1925, for the heroic conduct shown and noble service rendered in the rescue of the officers and crew of the Norwegian steamship Elven; to the officers and crew of the U. S. S. Republic as constituted on October 10, 1925, for the heroic conduct and noble service rendered in the rescue of the officers and crew of the United States patrol boat No. 134; and to the officers and crew of the British steamship Cameronia as constituted on October 11, 1925, for the heroic conduct and noble service rendered in the rescue of the crew of the U. S. Coast Guard patrol boat No. 128.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Commerce and the Director of the United States Mint be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to prepare a suitable die and to strike suitable gold medals commemorating the heroic conduct and noble services rendered in the rescues described in section 2 of this act, and present, in evidence of the esteem of the Nation for valorous conduct on the high seas in the face of great danger as demonstrated in such rescues, one of such medals to the captain of each of said rescuing ships, and to each person certified by the captain of the respective rescuing ships to have shown special courage and to have faced special danger in such rescues.

SEC. 4. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, from moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to cover the cost of designing, producing, and distributing said medals in the manner described in this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOAD LINES FOR AMERICAN VESSELS

The bill (S. 1781) to establish load lines for American vessels, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. I rather think this bill probably would take a little more time than we have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CONVEYANCE OF LAND TO COOK COUNTY, ILL.

The bill (H. R. 7191) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey certain land in Cook County, Ill., to the Chicago & Western Indiana Railroad Co., it successors or assigns, under certain conditions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COAST GUARD COMMISSIONED OFFICERS' RETIREMENT

The bill (H. R. 10540) to credit retired commissioned officers of the Coast Guard with active duty during the World War performed since retirement was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. JONES subsequently said: I think that if the Senator from Utah will let me read just the terms of House bill 10540 he will withdraw his objection to its consideration. It provides:

That all retired commissioned officers of the Coast Guard who served on active duty in the United States Navy or in the Coast Guard during the World War shall be credited with all actiye duty performed since retirement during the period from April 6, 1917, to March 3, 1921, in the computation of their longevity pay and pay periods; but no person shall be entitled to receive any back pay or allowances by reason of the enactment of this act.

The bill simply gives these men credit for their active duty during the war, and I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection to it.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HYDRAULIC LABORATORY, BUREAU OF STANDARDS

The bill (S. 1710) authorizing the establishment of a national hydraulic laboratory in the Bureau of Standards of the Department of Commerce and the construction of a building therefor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 2, line 3, after the word "accessories," to strike out the words "and including such cooperation with other Government departments, the States, technical and scientific institutions, and societies as may be deemed necessary"; and on page 2, to strike out the whole of section 2 and to substitute therefor the following:

SEC. 2. A board to be known as the national hydraulic laboratory board is hereby created, the three members of which shall be the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Interior, or in lieu thereof such other officer of each department as the Secretary thereof may designate. It shall be the duty of the board to determine from time to time a program of the projects to be undertaken and the manner in which the work is to be performed.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed $350,000, to be expended by the Secretary of Commerce for the construction and installation upon the present site of the Bureau of Standards in the District of Columbia of a suitable hydraulic laboratory building and such equipment, utilities, and appurtenances thereto as may be necessary.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be established in the Bureau of Standards of the Department of Commerce a national hydraulic laboratory for the determination of fundamental data useful in hydraulic research and engineering, including laboratory research relating to the behavior and control of river and harbor waters, the study of hydraulic structures and water flow, the development and testing of hydraulic instruments and accessories.

SEC. 2. A board to be known as the national hydraulic laboratory board is hereby created, the three members of which shall be the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Interior, or in lieu thereof such other officer of each department as the Secretary thereof may designate. It shall be the duty of the board to determine from time to time a program of the projects to be undertaken and the manner in which the work is to be performed.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed $350,000, to be expended by the Secretary of Commerce for the construction and installation upon the present site of the Bureau of Standards in the District of Columbia of a suitable hydraulic laboratory building and such equipment, utilities, and appurtenances thereto as may be necessary.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, this is a very important measure in connection with flood control, and a great many other subjects. It has been pending, I would say, for several years, and has been very thoroughly examined. I have the testimony before me here, covering nearly 200 printed pages. There is a report from the Secretary of Commerce in favor of it, and a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce. I would like to read just one paragraph from the letter of the Secretary of Commerce to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. He said:

> There is an urgent need for a national hydraulic laboratory equipped to carry out hydraulic experiments on an adequate scale. I am satisfied that such a laboratory at the Bureau of Standards would be of great service to the Nation and that it would soon repay the investment many times over through the savings effected in the cost of hydraulic structures resulting from the information gained through laboratory tests. Such savings have already been demonstrated by the work of several hydraulic laboratories in Europe, where great emphasis is being placed upon the value of the results obtained from experiments with models.

I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. KING. I do not object.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, in accordance with the agreement heretofore entered into, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of executive business. The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

Thereupon the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 55 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) adjourned, the adjournment being until Monday, April 16, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, April 13, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who didst teach that all men are sons of God and brothers in Him, and that there should not be cruel divisions and inequalities among them, Thy holy will be done throughout the earth. Praise comes to our lips because of the memory of the past—the past with its vicissitudes, its triumphs, its defeats, and its haunting risk of accident. Yet in Thy providence we have been kept by the strange mystery of Thy mercy. Our hearts turn to Thee in the deepest gratitude. The light of Thy love which lights up the book of life will continue to shine upon its future pages; Thou wilt go with us all the way. He who counts the sands and sets the prisoners free says to all hearts that are hungering through life, "Fear not, for I am with thee." Remember Thou these Representatives of the people, who are associated in service for the Republic. Let Heaven's choicest benedictions rest upon them and their homes. May all their decisions spring from balanced judgments, wisdom, and from a genuine sympathy for all men. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3555. An act to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE LADISLAS LAZARO

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following order, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 13th day of May, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public service of Hon. LADISLAS LAZARO, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

PENSIONS

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2900) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What is the bill?

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. The omnibus pension bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments alone be reported and that the bill be considered as read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the original bill be considered as read and that the amendments be reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the committee amendments, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate (S. 2900) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors," do pass with the following amendments:

Page 1, line 8, strike out "Infantry" and insert "Cavalry."

THE SECRET LEASING OF OUR OIL RESERVES

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the oil controversy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, during the fall of 1926, when Mr. Doheny and Mr. Fall were being tried in connection with the illegal obtaining of certain oil contracts, Secretary Wilbur appeared at this trial and gave testimony for the defendants, which in substance was that because of the belligerent attitude of Japan, as reported by Admiral Gleaves, it was necessary for the Navy to secretly make contracts for the building of a lot of oil tanks for the storage of a sufficient amount of oil to take care of any emergency in case Japan declared war against the United States, and bring about the development of certain oil reserves.

Because of this testimony the jury was influenced by Secretary Wilbur's defense of these oil conspirators to the extent that it brought in a verdict of not guilty. A little later the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a verdict to the effect that all of these contracts were tainted with fraud. According to the information given the public, the attorney for Mr. Doheny, Mr. Frank Hogan, was the recipient of a gift of $1,000,000 for having handled this case in such a way as to bring high public officials to the defense of his clients.

On the 29th of December, 1926, I gave out a statement to the press, which in part read as follows:

On the 17th day of December, 1926, at my suggestion before an executive session of the Naval Affairs Committee, Chairman BUTLER, of this committee, requested the clerk to ask the Navy Department to submit in confidence to the members of the Naval Affairs Committee the reports made by Admiral Gleaves relative to the belligerent attitude of Japan a few years ago. Admiral Campbell has just advised the clerk and myself that Secretary Wilbur is not willing for any member of the committee to see these reports, but on the other hand he has offered to appear before the committee and allow himself to be subjected to questions.

It will be remembered that this report has been made the excuse for the secrecy in disposing of our naval reserve oil lands and the construction of oil tanks in Hawaii. It will also be remembered that after the recent trial of Mr. Fall and Mr. Doheny one of the jurors gave out a statement in which the Japanese scare and this report were given as a justifiable reason for the verdict which exonerated them from any wrongdoing.

Members of Congress assigned to the Naval Affairs Committee are charged with the responsibility of supplying the needs of the Navy, and unless all of the facts are accessible to them they can not intelligently know how to proceed. If the legislative branch of the Government, which is the one closest to the people, is not entitled to have access to the records of a Government bureau then it is very likely that the time is near when the rank and file of the people will have no way of knowing the real situation that exists with respect to the safety and protection of the Nation. Therefore if members of the Naval Affairs Committee are to be refused the right to see reports relative to the attitude of other nations, then the officers in charge of the Navy will soon be able to adopt any policy, whether right or wrong.

I was advised some time ago by a high-ranking officer in the Navy that these so-called Japanese reports contain no information which would show a belligerent attitude on the part of Japan, and that the department could not afford to allow any Member of Congress to see these reports for the reason they would show that the secret policy of the Navy with respect to the oil leases and the building of tanks was not justified. In fact these reports, according to the information given me, mostly concern the killing of an American sailor and the finding of some oil on the water after the Japanese earthquake. It is known by every person that Japan diplomatically and respectfully disposed of the case where the sailor was killed, according to the custom usually followed by other nations. In fact we have been unfortunate enough to have sailors killed in several other countries without any thought of trouble between the nations. In my opinion this Japanese scare is now put forth for the purpose of exciting the citizenship of the United States so that pressure will be brought in favor of a new shipbuilding policy costing four or five hundred million dollars. Notwithstanding there is an apathy in agricultural sections of the United States, I will gladly vote for such a policy, provided it can be shown that Japan assumed a belligerent attitude when these reports were made by Admiral Gleaves.

According to the Washington Daily News of Monday, April 9, 1928, it is again proposed to use this same Japanese scare in the trial of the case which is now being conducted in Washington. The article states that the attorney for Mr. Sinclair will argue "that the Navy Department had received a report of danger of war in the Pacific and needed its oil above ground for war storage in Hawaii." Everyone now knows that Japan has assumed the most friendly disposition toward the United States and that this so-called Japanese war scare was used by the Navy for a period of 20 years for the purpose of influencing Congress to obtain additional appropriations.

If the Secretary of the Navy is going to allow himself to become a rubber stamp for these oil conspirators, the President of the United States should order these reports of Admiral Gleaves to be made public in fairness to Japan and the jury, which was misled by the statements made by Secretary Wilbur in this connection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from and to the president of the Izaak Walton League of Ohio on the subject of conservation.

Mr. UNDERHILL. On what subject?

Mr. DAVEY. Conservation.

Mr. UNDERHILL. A letter from whom?

Mr. DAVEY. The president of the Izaak Walton League of Ohio.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if this comes within the general group to which I object ordinarily.

Mr. DAVEY. I could not tell the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If it is correspondence between the two gentlemen, I think I shall have to object until I know more about it.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12875) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12875, with Mr. HAWLEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire to use. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, on behalf of the legislative subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that prepared this bill I am going to ask your indulgence a few minutes to talk to you about a matter that has been a perpetual subject of discussion in this body for 75 years, namely: The ventilation and reconstruction of this House Chamber. [Applause.]

I think a very brief preliminary reference to a few historical events will be interesting as a background to what I am going to say.

As you are all aware, George Washington laid the corner stone of this Capitol Building September 18, 1793. The main building is built of sandstone from Aquia Creek, Va. Congress first occupied the building on November 17, 1800. Before the building was completed the British Army set fire to it and burned it on August 24, 1814. It was promptly rebuilt and finished within a few years thereafter.

The Senate occupied the room now used by the United States Supreme Court, and the House used the room now dedicated to the National Statuary Hall.

On September 6, 1850, Congress passed an act authorizing the extension and construction of the present Senate and House wings of the Capitol, and on July 4, 1851, President Millard Fillmore laid the corner stone of this House wing. Daniel Webster, the then Secretary of State, was the orator of the day and delivered a wonderfully eloquent and historic oration. The corner stone they laid is in the northeast corner of this south wing, while the corner stone of the main building is in the southeast corner. Both ceremonies were conducted by the Masonic bodies of Maryland and Virginia.

On December 16, 1857, this Hall was first occupied by the House of Representatives—70 years ago last December.

The north wing was not occupied by the Senate until January 4, 1859. Both of these wings are built of marble from Lee, Mass., and they were completed in 1860. The columns are built of marble from Cockeysville, Md. The entire building is 751 by 350 feet and cost $14,455,000.

From 1851 to 1865 the Architect of the Capitol was Thomas U. Walter, a high-class and capable man.

For many years the construction of the Capitol was under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior. On March 23, 1853, President Franklin Pierce ordered the Capitol construction transferred from the Interior Department to the War Department, and on April 4, 1853, Jefferson Davis, who was then Secretary of War, under President Pierce, appointed Capt. Montgomery C. Meigs as superintendent of construction of the Senate and House wings. There was some lack of harmony between the two departments and also between Architect Walter and Superintendent Meigs, and from time to time much criticism, especially in Congress.

The old Senate and House Chambers were built in the early part of the nineteenth century as evolved from the highest development of classical types and are semicircular and well adapted to the purpose for which they were built, especially in the very important matter of acoustics, and Architect Walter wanted to follow that style of architecture in the construction of the new Senate and House Chambers, and also extend the Senate Chamber out to the north outside wall and the House Chamber out to the south outside wall, while Captain Meigs (afterwards Major General Meigs) was determined to make both Chambers entirely inside rooms, as he said, to avoid outside noises, and he seems to have had the support of the President and Secretary of War and a majority of Congress at that time, and his judgment prevailed, and that one man has caused the Senate and House to sit in these two inside, square or rectangular, uncomfortable rooms, with artificial light, poor ventilation, and abominable acoustics for all these 70 years. This exact condition was foreseen, however, long before the Chambers were completed.

On January 24, 1854, there was a bitter debate in Congress over these inside rooms. That was three years before the House moved into this room. The Members complained that there were no windows in this room and that the doors led only to smoking rooms and corridors, and they led only to more corridors and halls or to no place, and many Senators and Representatives denounced this condition vehemently. However, Meigs prevailed. He was relieved of his position in 1860, but that was after the Chambers were completed. On April 16, 1862, President Lincoln retransferred the Capitol back to the Interior Department.

But the dissatisfaction over these inside rooms has continued ever since 1853.

The floor of this Chamber is 113 by 67 feet and the outside walls of the room around the gallery are 139 by 93 feet. The ceiling is 36 feet high, making the cubical contents of this Chamber in round numbers 400,000 cubic feet. All that air should properly be changed about eight times every hour that the Chamber is occupied, which would require 3,200,000 cubic feet per hour, or 63,333 cubic feet per minute, of fresh air. The temperature should be from 68 degrees to 72 degrees in cold weather and about 15 degrees less than the outside temperature in warm weather, and the humidity should be at from 30 to 50 per cent for a proper comfort zone, with proper air motion and no drafts. There should be fanned in and fanned out of this room not less than from 20 to 50 cubic feet per minute per person of fresh and properly conditioned air. With 500 people in the House and gallery we would have about 125 cubic feet per person, and with 2,000 in the room and gallery we would have about 30 cubic feet of air per person.

THE PRESENT VENTILATION SYSTEM

This system was built some 30 years ago, and it is now obsolete. It consists of a 30-foot high tower down in the park and a tunnel 500 feet long from under that tower to the basement of this wing of the Capitol.

The air is drawn through the tunnel by large fans and passes over primary heaters—coils of hot pipes—in the basement and is then forced through a vacant chamber 4 or 5 feet high, right underneath this floor, and which is called a plenum, and thence through this floor under all of our seats, and also all around the wall and through the floor in the gallery. Large fans above ceiling lift the air and force it out under the roof. There is a strong upward pull of air all the time that we are in this room. The air is some 6 to 8 degrees lower in temperature where it enters at our feet than at our breathing line some 5 feet above. To have ordinarily a breathing temperature of about 70° the air must come in at about 62°, which is sometimes too cool on our feet.

We have no provision at all for regulating the amount of humidity in the air we breathe. No modern or proper system for air distribution, or motion to prevent drafts. No system for the proper control of temperature. No system at all for cooling the air in warm weather. No system at all for conditioning air at any time for proper comfort. The air is not treated at all. The dust and dirt, and smoke, if any, comes up in our faces. Our ceiling and attic are almost red hot in the summer, and there is no way of cooling them. This room is always uncomfortable in hot weather because it is too hot, and in extreme cold weather it is uncomfortable because of lack of sufficient humidity in the air. In other words, the present system simply fans in and fans out so many cubic feet of air per minute. In the wintertime it heats it. That warm air heats this room. That is all the heat we get.

The Capitol heating plant does not heat this room. That sends hot steam up to the Capitol and into a large number of coils of pipe, and the air passes over these coils and is warmed that way, and we are warmed by and breathe that heated and dried air. It is hot, dry air, like comes out of an oven. It is too dry and lifeless, not moist enough. The humidity is dried out too much and sometimes contains less than 20 per cent of humidity, which is not enough for either health or comfort. It should properly be from 40 per cent to 50 per cent. That lack of humidity causes discomfiture and tires us out. Its continuance is bound to be harmful.

The present system is not as comfortable or healthful or sanitary as the modern systems. This lack of humidity regulation, and temperature, and air-motion control is a drain on our physical systems that should not be tolerated any longer. We suffer from colds, sinus infections, and various respiratory troubles, caused principally by lower vitality acquired in this Chamber.

After three or four hours in this Chamber everyone knows that we are all fagged out. Nobody needs to tell us that. In the wintertime the outside air is pumped in at, say, 15 or 20 or 30 degrees temperature, and is heated up to 70 degrees, and the moisture is nearly all dried out of it, so that it is not invigorating enough. That kind of air detracts from our physical and mental activity and abilities.

Physical and mental efficiency drop off wherever temperature and humidity are not maintained at the right point. We are more susceptible to breakdowns in health.

Many of us have reached the age where we should not be subjected to constant, extra, and unnecessary strains. We are certainly entitled to as good a hygienic system in this Chamber as is now being furnished in practically all modern theaters, auditoriums, hotels, and other large public gathering places.

THE NEW SYSTEM OF VENTILATION PROVIDED FOR IN THIS BILL

The modern system pumps the air into the room from the ceiling instead of from the floor. The air is first washed—all of it must go through a spray of clean water, removing all particles of dust or dirt or smoke and all solid matters of any kind.

The air is then heated or cooled, or both, if necessary, and brought to the proper degree of temperature and humidity. The air is heated by passing through preheaters, a system of heating coils.

The air is brought to the proper humidity and temperature in summer by refrigeration, and in winter by heating the spray of water to the proper temperature. Then this washed and properly conditioned air is passed through eliminators to remove excess water and then heated or cooled as necessary, and pumped into this Chamber through the roof or ceiling, 30 feet above our heads, and is pumped out down through the floor.

So there will always be a continuous and proper supply and flow of properly conditioned air going through this Chamber, and a similar and separate supply for the galleries and cloakrooms.

The temperature of the spray is so regulated as to control the necessary amount of moisture in the air. That is, the washing regulates the humidity. There will be no drafts at all, as there are now none in the large modern theaters.

This Chamber will be more comfortable, healthier, and sanitary. For 70 years Congress has been living and working in this human thermos bottle. All modern schools and hospitals get all of their ventilation and most of their light through windows.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does the reconstruction of this Hall contemplate changing the Chamber so that it will be an outside chamber?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am coming to that in a few minutes.

There are two things now under consideration by this committee. The first is the ventilation, and the other is the possible reconstruction and remodeling of this Chamber; and I want to first conclude what I have to say about the ventilation and hygienic and health conditions in this room.

Mr. EDWARDS. I have no faith in the ventilation unless you make it an outside chamber.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Health and comfort depend on three things; namely:

First, temperature.

Second, ventilation (air motion).

Third, humidity.

The problem is to furnish an abundance of fresh, pure air, containing the normal amount of humidity, and safe air motion, and at a proper and comfortable temperature every day in the year, regardless of the temperature outside. We must have a cooling system for the summer time. The rate and direction of the air motion in the room is very important. To be comfortable, we must always have a fairly good breeze passing through the Chamber without the slightest particle of draft. To accomplish that we must reverse our present system. Instead of having the air come in right at and on our feet, we want it to come in 30 feet above our heads.

Without ever having any draft we must have the ventilation such that our bodies will always be properly cooled, so that we may be perfectly comfortable.

At present the air in this Chamber becomes overheated and our bodies are overheated, and there is no safe way of cooling them. That condition is uncomfortable and unhealthy. We need a system of ventilation that will dispose of the excess heat without any drafts. In other words, we want a system as near as possible like outdoor air in fair weather and at a comfortable temperature. To have that, the air must come from above, instead of forcing the dust and dirt and insanitary air from the carpet at our feet up into our faces.

We do not now have a sanitary or scientific air distribution; and our temperature is too high and the humidity too low. I feel safe in saying that there is not a large modern theater, or a church, or modern schoolhouse, or hospital, or auditorium, or large public-meeting place anywhere in the entire United States as poorly ventilated as this House Chamber. It is the judgment of this committee that we must have a new system of ventilation and air conditioning in this Chamber.

Fifty-three Senators and 120 Members of this House have passed to the Great Beyond since I entered this body. One hundred and seventy-three great Americans, whom I well knew, and whose lives were a great loss to our country, and whose public careers were abruptly terminated during their service in these two inside Chambers, that are so poorly ventilated, so poorly lighted, and so poorly heated.

And from quite a little inquiry and investigation I can further say that an appallingly large per cent of all of the many hundreds of former Members of the Senate and House have died within a very few years after their retirement.

Whether entirely right or not, I know that the friends of many of those deceased Members will always feel that the atmospheric and hygienic conditions in these two Chambers had something to do with their untimely death.

I sometimes think there is also a kind of a psychology in this matter of both light and ventilation in this Chamber. The American people just naturally do not like to live in inside rooms. They like the sunlight and the fresh air. They do not like artificial light in the daytime, if they can avoid it, and they do not like to breathe artificial air at any time, if they can avoid it. In my judgment that has something to do with the actual fact that for all these 70 years the House and Senate have occupied these two inside Chambers; the Members never have been and never will feel quite satisfied or comfortable in these so-called thermos-bottle Chambers, and just as sure as the sun shines outdoors, and never shines in here, Congress sooner or later will reverse the will of General Meigs and follow the judgment of Architect Walter and extend both of these Chambers to the outside walls, for better light and air, and also remodel the rooms from a present rectangular to a semicircular and amphitheater form, for better acoustics; and I think we ought to do it now. [Applause.]

The new system proposed in this bill, I believe, will greatly improve our comfort and general well-being and health, and reduce colds and respiratory diseases. We would all feel better, have less fatigue, and be in better physical condition and feel more active and alert mentally and physically. Our better health will more than pay the Government for this investment of $323,000, and the operation of the new system will not cost any more than the present one. This modern system is, I am informed, in practical and satisfactory operation in many large cities, especially New York, in the following buildings:

Roxy Theater, capacity	6,000
Paramount Theater, capacity	3,540
Rivoli Theater, capacity	2,130
Ziegfield Theater, capacity	2,000
Rialto Theater, capacity	1,918

and probably a hundred other theaters and modern auditoriums of various kinds.

By permission of the House I will attach to my remarks and insert in the RECORD a tabulation showing the necrology record of Congress for the past 35 years, giving the names and dates of deaths of 87 Senators and 203 Representatives, a total of 290 deaths, and separating them for each Congress.

Many eminent health specialists and physicians assert that this mortality statement shows that the death rate in Congress is much higher than it is among men of the same age in the ordinary walks of life.

The tabulation shows that, with few exceptions, there have nearly always been more deaths proportionately where Congess has held long sessions than short ones. For instance, the Fifty-third Congress was in session a total number of 447 days, and had 15 deaths, while the Fifty-fourth Congress was in session 280 days and had only 4 deaths. The Fifty-seventh Congress was in session 304 days and had 7 deaths. The Fifty-eighth Congress was in session 262 days and had only 10 deaths. The Sixty-third Congress was in session 654 days and had 15 deaths, and ordinarily would have had a greater loss but for the fact that during all the first session only the Ways and Means Committee was appointed and was working. The rest of Congress was not working. While the Sixty-fourth Congress was in session 368 days and had only 10 deaths, the Sixty-fifth Congress was in session 634 days and had 25 deaths, while the Sixty-sixth Congress was in session 462 days and had only 16 deaths.

A preliminary estimate for this new system was submitted a year ago of $430,000, of which $245,000 was for the House and $185,000 for the Senate, and the Senate included that amount in the deficiency appropriation bill that failed.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. Do I understand in the contemplated study that there is also the question of improving the acoustic properties of the Hall?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes. The British House of Commons is a rectangular room, 45 by 60 feet square, about one-third the size of this Hall, and they have 673 members. There is no other legislative body in the world of any important nation that has a hall of this shape or this size. France, Germany, and I think nearly all nations except England have semicircular halls, amphitheater shape, or oval halls, where it is claimed the acoustics is very much better than it is or ever can be in this room.

The old Senate Chamber and the old House Chamber were splendid Chambers. They were, and are, not only artistic, but ideally fitted for a legislative body. I think nearly every Member of this House for the last 75 years has felt that was a great mistake when that style of architecture was changed to the square form of this Chamber.

The House should know that the House Appropriations Committee and this subcommittee that prepared and is in charge of this bill are more or less in consultation with the like committee of the Senate, and we have definitely decided to go on with the work of reconstructing our ventilation system, and we provide for that in this bill. For the House and Senate together we are appropriating in this bill $323,000 for this purpose. This House committee has not recommended or appropriated anything in this bill for the reconstruction of either the House or Senate Chamber. For the two Halls it would cost over a million dollars, and we have not yet felt warranted in going that far. If, however, the Senate, when they come to consider this bill, decide to go ahead with the reconstruction of their Chamber, and if they add to this bill an item for that purpose, then when the bill comes back to the House it will be for us to then decide whether or not we will join the Senate and have both Chambers reconstructed at the same time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Assuming that the ventilation plan is to be carried into effect, then what would be the argument as to moving this south wall and putting it back?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The principal arguments would be for better acoustics, more convenient arrangement of the Hall, and a much more beautiful and artistic Chamber. More like the legislative halls of nearly all other great nations. I personally have only seen the House of Commons and the French Chamber of Deputies and a few others, but I understand that nearly every important nation in the world has a much more beautiful and finer legislative hall than this is.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. KING. Would it not be of material assistance to the acoustic properties if there was a platform about 8 inches high where the gentleman is now standing? That would raise him up to the level of his peers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; of course, that would help a little. But this is the largest legislative hall in the world, and we never can get rid of the confusion in this Chamber unless and until we entirely remodel the shape of this room. The hearings that we have held are printed, and they are very instructive and interesting. They include some 75 or 80 pages that ought to be read by every Member.

From 1890 to 1913 this matter was considered exhaustively and elaborate reports were made on it. I will add just a few extracts from a very lengthy and learned report made by a very able committee in the Sixtieth Congress, which answers the very question the gentleman from Illinois asks me, as follows:

[H. Rept. No. 1688, 60th Cong., 1st sess.]

The Committee on the Library, having had under consideration the resolution to rearrange, in a temporary way, before the reassembling of the Congress in December, 1908, the Hall of the House of Representatives and the seating arrangements therein (H. Res. 419), recommend that the same do pass.

The purpose of the resolution is to make the Hall of the House suitable for the transaction of public business and to do away with a condition which makes the House of Representatives the most disorderly and the noisest legislative body in the world. In extreme dimensions the Hall, including the galleries, is now 139 feet long, 93 feet wide, and 36 feet high, and the floor of the Hall is 113 feet long by 70 feet in width. The enormous size of the Hall makes it very difficult for a Member with a voice of ordinary strength to be heard even under the best conditions, while if any degree of confusion exists it becomes in most cases impossible to hear one who is speaking halfway across the Hall. In order to agitate this enormous volume of air many of the Members are compelled to make a very special effort, and the energy that should be employed in the brain is diverted to the lungs, and a style is demanded which is destructive of the argumentative manner and leads to declamation and the mere ad captandum.

The conversational tone, which is the tone consistent with thought, it is useless to attempt to employ. The inability to hear begets disorder, for many men will not sit idly in the attitude of listening when they are able to hear nothing that is going on. They will devote themselves to their correspondence or to conversation with those who are sitting near them. As a result the normal condition of the House is one of extreme confusion. To the casual visitor in the galleries it is often impossible to know who is addressing the House. Pertinent interruptions and questions are often unnoticed because they are unheard. Parliamentary government in its literal sense is government by speaking and the correlative of speaking is hearing. If it is impossible to hear, speaking becomes of no account, and in proportion as the difficulty of hearing is increased the value of speaking is diminished.

The House of Representatives occupies the largest legislative hall in the world, and it is chiefly due to that fact that it is not the greatest legislative body in the world. Visitors of distinction often come to its galleries prepared to witness sympathetically the proceedings of the great representative body of the American people, and, seeing nothing but chaos and confusion, they are compelled to record impressions which are not complimentary to the House. Thousands of American citizens who come to Washington carry with them to their homes a similar impression.

The object of this resolution is to make the House of Representatives a parliamentary body in the real sense of the word. It is to make it truly worthy of the people it represents by improving the quality of its legislation and securing more firmly the sway of reason by destroying the premium which the present system gives to mere sound and fury to enable Members to make themselves heard. The present Hall should be shortened to a length of not exceeding 95 feet, including the galleries, and not exceeding 75 feet upon the floor. The width of the present Hall north and south would remain as it is now. A seating capacity could be provided upon benches, either arranged in monastery style or semicircular, for at least 500 Members.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I understand the gentleman to say that if the House and Senate Chambers are remodeled it will cost about a million dollars?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. And if they are remodeled about 75 per cent of this $323,000 which is proposed to be expended for ventilation will be wasted?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There would be a large waste, estimated all the way from 50 to 75 per cent. But both the Senate and House are determined to go ahead with the remodeling of the ventilation system now. If we do that, and then in a few years or some time in the future decide to reconstruct these Chambers, the architects tell us that it would tear out nearly all of this new ventilation system and that we would have to rebuild it in the new remodeled Chambers. The Senate and House ought to, and I think they will, act together in the matter, and in this bill we are passing up to the Senate the question of the present or future reconstruction of these two Chambers.

Mr. BYRNS. I notice that in the Senate there has been some agitation, particularly from one Senator from New York——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; Senator COPELAND, who is one of the greatest health authorities in the world, is very actively interested in this matter. I have conferred with him.

Mr. BYRNS. Has the gentleman any information as to what will be the attitude of the Senate if they accept this proposition?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; the Senate in the last Congress put in the emergency deficiency bill an item of $185,000 for this change in the ventilation system of the Senate, but as you know, that was lost in the filibuster, and they are going ahead again in this bill with that same provision. Both the Senate and the House are going to have a better ventilation system. Now, whether or not the Senate is going ahead independently with the remodeling of their Chamber, I can not say. We have talked with several of the leaders of the Senate, and they have not yet decided. But they have decided to go ahead, as I have stated, with the ventilation system.

The House needs these changes about five times as much as the Senate does, because we are about five times as numerous. Whatever is done should be done to both Chambers, and done at the same time. We would save $15,000 or $20,000 by putting in the two ventilation systems together, and we would save from $25,000 to $50,000 by doing the reconstruction of the Chambers together. And if the Senate decides to go on now with the reconstruction of both the ventilation systems and the Chamber, I think we should go right along with them.

Mr. BYRNS. I understand the gentleman and his committee, from the thorough investigation that they have made, are satisfied that if this money is expended it will bring an improvement, as the gentleman suggests?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. I will say we have had the benefit of the advice of some of the best experts in the United States, and we are satisfied that the ventilation system now in operation in all these new modern theaters is working practically, and that it will be a very great benefit to the comfort, general welfare, and health of the Members, and is a wise expenditure. Moreover, there is no doubt but what nearly all the membership of this House is in favor of better ventilation, better air, and a better system of temperature and air circulation than we now have. We do not know and have not yet tried to learn definitely the sentiment of the House on the question of, at this time, authorizing the reconstruction of the House Chamber.

Mr. BYRNS. It seems to me that a sufficient amount of time should be allowed to elapse to see the effect of the expenditure.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, I am speaking for and by direct authority of this committee that has jurisdiction of this matter, and am doing my best to advise the House as fully as I can about every phase of the subject. We are convinced that the House is safe in approving this appropriation for our own health and strength. But the whole subject is one for the House to determine, and, of course, the committee will cheerfully abide by its decision.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman's plan involve an enlargement of this Chamber?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As I have said in substance before, there are several reasons for reconstructing and remodeling this Chamber. The first is to obtain better acoustics, which the experts say we could and which we certainly very much need. Secondly, nearly all the Members would like to see the Hall moved to the south wall and get some daylight and better air. People like to see out. Third, there is nothing artistic about this room. As I just said, I think everyone who has ever visited the national legislative bodies of other countries feel that this, the richest Nation in the world, is entitled to a very much more convenient, artistic, better-arranged, and better-looking and more comfortable room than this is. I was in hopes we might make the gallery larger and be able to accommodate more people on state occasions. But the architects tell us if we are going to have much better acoustics we can not enlarge the Hall, and that it is now larger than necessary, and might very well be reduced some, which would tend to produce much better hearing and more orderly legislative proceedings.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would it not be a good idea to provide the Members with desks?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We are considering that as well as the comfort and convenience of the Members in every way.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am gratified that the gentleman has taken up this matter. I understand we are going right ahead with this proposition?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. We are going right ahead with the ventilation proposition. I will ask, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a table of the necrology of this House for the last 35 years, and possibly some other data that appears in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. If it be true that the rectangular form of assembly hall is not scientific and not to be desired, and that the circular form would be better, would it not be the part of wisdom and prudence to first determine the form of this Hall and then make the necessary changes to conform with that? Why not determine that matter, determine once for all the proper form, which is believed to be the circular form?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. From the hearings there is no question in my mind that the experience of all legislative bodies and the scientific knowledge of the present time indicates that for convenient hearing and speaking, for public gatherings, a hall should be of semicircular form, an amphitheater shape, or cylindrical or oval hall. This Hall is the worst legislative hall in the world for orderly legislative purposes.

Mr. LOZIER. That being true, does not the gentleman think that the American people and the American Congress will ultimately come to that conclusion and prefer that form of hall? And if that is true, why not bring about that result?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will frankly say to the House that from our thorough investigation—and I have been on this committee for many years and we have had this matter up time and again—some time before many years this Chamber is going to be remodeled. And, of course, the businesslike thing to do would be to reconstruct the Chamber and remodel the ventilation at the same time, instead of putting the new ventilation plant in now and then throw away a large part of that $323,000 and reconstruct the Hall and build another ventilation plant. But it will cost at least $600,000 to do it, and neither the main Appropriations Committee of 35 members, nor our legislative subcommittee, feel like recommending this expenditure without some more specific approval and direction from the House.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. The cost of the ventilating plan and the heating plan which you have in mind will be approximately $300,000?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; the estimate is $323,000.

Mr. EDWARDS. The gentleman says that a very large per cent of that will be wasted if we later decide to change the plan and move the Hall back.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; somewhere between 50 and 75 per cent of it will probably be destroyed by the change. It will not fit in with the remodeled Chamber. At least, that is what the architects say. You understand that the estimate of $323,000 covers the entire cost of remodeling the ventilation plant of both the Senate and House.

Mr. EDWARDS. So you will spend practically one-third of the amount it would cost to remodel the Chamber on this plan of ventilating and heating, which the gentleman says will eventually be quite largely wasted.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. One hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars of that total estimate of $323,000 for a new ventilation plant is for the House and the rest is for the Senate. We feel that we have got to go ahead with that new ventilation whether we remodel this Chamber or not. We may never reconstruct this Chamber, and, in the meantime, we are not going to continue to sit in this insanitary and unhealthy Chamber. I think both of these improvements should be made, and made at this time.

Mr. EDWARDS. It seems to me it would be in the interest of economy and good judgment to make this change in the Hall now and make it an outside Chamber, instead of spending about one-third of the cost on this ventilating system, which will be largely wasted if that change is ever made.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the gentleman from Georgia is absolutely right, and I was in hopes we might have a full House here to present this very important matter to. But the attendance here this afternoon is not over a third of the House, and I feel that we ought to in some way get as near as possible all the Members to learn about it and think it over. And in the meantime, my judgment is we ought to agree upon this ventilation system. I think we ought to put it in this bill, as I am sure we will, and send it over to the Senate; then if the Senate decides to go ahead now with the program of remodeling the Senate Chamber, I think we ought to join with them. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I presume the gentleman from Colorado is familiar with the fact that some years ago Representative McCall, of Massachusetts, afterwards the governor of that State, introduced a bill along this line?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; I know he did, and he did a very large amount of most intelligent investigating and work. And he made a wonderfully comprehensive, learned, and excellent report, and we have inserted most of it in our hearings, beginning at page 365. He was one of the highest class of gentlemen and most capable legislators that I have ever known in this body.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman referred to that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, indeed, we have most carefully considered Governor McCall's statements and recommendations. There have been a large number of the brightest men this country has ever produced that have at various times considered this matter.

On January 10, 1913, a committee composed of Champ Clark, Joseph G. Cannon, James R. Mann, John J. Fitzgerald, and Swagar Shirley reported on this matter. No Congress ever had an abler committee of five men than that committee was.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That bill passed this House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; it created a building commission "to supervise the reconstruction of the Hall of the House of Representatives," and authorized and directed them to proceed and reconstruct this House Chamber. I fully believe if we could in some way fully explain all the facts and the history of this matter to all the Members of the House that they would practically unanimously direct this reconstruction to be made.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. My recollection is that after that bill passed the House, with a certainty of its enactment into law, a technical defect was discovered by Representative Fitzgerald, of Brooklyn, which resulted in the nullification of the whole thing.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This matter of reconstructing this Chamber has been under consideration ever since January 24, 1854—four years before the House ever met here. But the House has always acted like Mark Twain said the people do about the weather:

> Everybody complains about it, but nobody does anything about it.

On December 10, 1890, Congress passed a resolution—> to at once inquire into the practicability of removing the partitions and galleries on the south side of the Hall, to obtain additional floor room and additional light and ventilation.

Again, in 1909, Congress appropriated $25,000 to start the work, and in 1911 appropriated an additional $350,000 to carry on the work of reconstructing this Hall. And several thousand dollars were spent on investigations and plans and specifications, but they never actually commenced work, and after several years those appropriations were covered back into the Treasury. From 1913 to the present time, I do not recall that anything of importance has been done. We have all those plats, and so forth, and this committee has examined them.

Mr. ABERNETHY. May I ask the gentleman if this is not the practical situation, that we can all get together on this ventilation proposition at the present time, but if we undertake to change the building there is no telling when we will get together on it? Is not that the practical situation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. The practical situation, gentlemen, is that we can and we are going ahead right now with this change of this ventilation system and have it made this coming summer and fall, and we believe that it will reduce the number of deaths, increase efficiency and health and comfort, and prevent a great deal of illness in this Chamber, and that we are not only warranted in making this expenditure, but that it will pay the Government to do so.

Mr. ABERNETHY. This has the unanimous approval of the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. That is practically settled, so far as the ventilation is concerned, but we have not made any determination at all as to the reconstruction of this Chamber.

Mr. ABERNETHY. But if we get into this other question of reconstructing this Chamber, it may be years before we could have any changes made.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; we have determined upon our ventilation matter, but I think the change of these two wings of the Capitol should come from the Senate, and if the Senate decides to go ahead with their end of this Capitol and remodel it, then it is for us to decide whether or not we will join them or whether we will wait to see how successful their efforts are.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. As I understand, as soon as the House adjourns in the afternoon all the doors are closed, all of the windows are pulled down, and that all of the foul air which is left stays here until we reconvene the next day.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman's information is partially correct and part erroneous. When we adjourn in the afternoon it is true that these doors are closed, and it is also true that the fans then stop running. But it is incorrect to say that everything is closed up air-tight until the next day at noon. The fans are started at 6 o'clock every morning and the fresh air is fanned into this Chamber for practically six hours before we reconvene. The pipes are heated from the heating plant. We do not get any heat in here from the heating plant. The only heat we get is from the air that has been drawn in from the outside by fans and forced through and over the coils of hot pipes. This Chamber is cleaned out and renovated every morning, so that when we come here at 12 o'clock this Chamber is always properly conditioned as far as it is possible for them to condition it with our present system, but with this kind of a plant all they can do is to pump in fresh air and pump it out. That is all they do, and that is not the modern system. Our plant has not been materially changed for 30 years, and it is obsolete.

Mr. COLLINS. Has the gentleman made any inquiry as to whether anyone is required to sleep in this Chamber at night?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I have not.

Mr. COLLINS. Or in these cloakrooms?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I do not know. But if a watchman or anyone should be here, there is always some air gets in here from the outside, at least enough for a man to breathe.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman came here at about the same time I did, and I think then there was a model in the room out there and diagrams showing what was proposed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. I came in here at the convening of the extra session of Congress in March, 1909, and about the first thing I saw was the picture of the proposed new House Chamber, and I thought it looked very beautiful.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Was that based upon any legislation that had been passed?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; we appropriated the money for it. We appropriated $375,000 to make the change for this room alone. But President Taft kept us in session practically all of his administration of four years, and President Wilson and the war kept us in session for eight years more, practically speaking.

Mr. LINTHICUM. We did not have time to have the work done owing to the frequency of our sessions.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. You understand that the reconstruction of this Chamber could not possibly be made this coming summer because the vacation will not be long enough, but it will be long enough to remodel our ventilation system. When we come back here next December we can, and I believe we will, have a new ventilation system including a new manner of controlling the air motion and the humidity and the temperature of this building. But if we undertook to rebuild the entire House Chamber we would have to put that off until next year when after the adjournment on March 4, 1929, there will be a nine months' vacation, if no extra session is called by the new administration.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. How long will it take to change the Chamber?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It will take seven months on both the Senate and the House Chamber. But the work on both of them can go on at the same time.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then could we not in the meantime, by a special act, meet somewhere else until we can get the Chamber completed?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I guess we could, but they could not get ready now to do the work this summer, and if there is no extra session in 1929 they could easily get ready in advance and do the work that spring, summer, and fall.

Mr. EDWARDS. The question in my mind is whether we should not let the Senate know we really prefer a change in the Chamber now, because to my mind it is foolishness to think of spending three hundred and twenty-odd thousand dollars for a heating and ventilating system when what we really want and ought to have is an outside Chamber. It seems to me we ought to go directly to the thing we want done.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. You understand the $323,000 is for a ventilation system for both Chambers and, of course, if the Senate went ahead with the remodeling of its room they would not waste their part of it. But as I have said before, I think it is the businesslike thing to do, to do both jobs at once.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Would we scrap the ventilation system if we determined to change the Chamber?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The reconstruction of this Chamber in the manner and to the extent contemplated would necessarily involve the tearing out practically of whatever ventilating system we are using at that time whether it is the present or the proposed new system. The machinery which is very expensive would not be destroyed. But there would be quite an expense for rebuilding the ventilation in the reconstructed Chamber.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is the question I wished to ask. Could we reutilize at all in the extension of the Chamber the ventilation system that we might put in now?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The architects and engineers and others advise this committee that both wings of the Capitol will be so completely changed that the ventilation apparatus will have to all be torn out and rebuilt or at least practically so, and that the loss would be probably 50 to 75 per cent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then why take two bites at the cherry?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is about the way I look at it.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Do the architects or ventilation engineers say that giving us access to open windows would give us sufficient ventilation or would we have to have an auxiliary system?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We would still use an auxiliary plant because three sides of the Chamber would still be inside and besides the windows do not furnish cool air in the summer, and we must use this warmed air to warm this Chamber in the winter time. I think we would continue to use the plant at least most of the time.

Mr. CARSS. In that event the $320,000 would not be 50 or 75 per cent wasted.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Personally, I can not understand why so much of the ventilation plant should be scrapped by remodeling this Chamber. But the engineers seem to have that impression.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. EATON. As I understand, there is no guarantee we will change the room, but there is an opportunity to improve the present ventilating system.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. We have definitely decided to change our ventilation system and put in the modern system of conditioning the air we breathe.

Mr. EATON. Then, for humanity's sake, let us go ahead and do it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We expect to go ahead with that work this summer and have an up-to-date plant in here when we return next December. But if the Senate should decide to not only put in a new ventilating plant, but also to entirely reconstruct their wing of the Capitol, and do both at the same time, that would put their part of it off until the summer of 1929, and we would have to decide whether or not we would do the same thing with this wing.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I say we need not become unduly alarmed as to the immediate necessity of this.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am not unduly alarmed, or alarmed at all. I am telling the House what our committee has decided to do, and giving the reasons for our action. We are going to go ahead and put in a new ventilation system and if the House wants to go further and reconstruct this building, that is for the Members to decide. This committee has not yet decided to do that.

Senator COPELAND, of New York, and other eminent health authorities, say that compared with men of similar ages and conditions the death rate in Congress is higher than it is in the ordinary walks of life. And while I have no definite data excepting my own observations and thought on the matter, and the results of a great deal of inquiry and investigation, I firmly believe that if a detailed investigation could be made of the Members who have served here more than two terms and did not die in office, that it would be shown that they went out with impaired health and that their lives were shortened by this service. If this is true, it does seem to me it would be worth many times the cost of the change to the Government of the United States in the better health and the increased efficiency and comfort and general well-being of the membership of this House.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to make an observation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; if it is brief.

Mr. LINTHICUM. When I was in the house of delegates of the State of Maryland we had at the beginning there an old house chamber that was on the outside and everybody seemed to be complaining about the windows being open, and we were all the time trying to settle the question of how to get ventilation through the windows without keeping them open. Then we built a new senate and house chamber and we placed them just about like this Chamber, and for that reason I would like to know what is to be accomplished by having the Chamber on the outside.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, I do not pretend to speak as a physician or health expert or hygienic specialist or sanitary engineer or heating and ventilating engineer or any other kind of scientific information, but this matter has been under consideration by Congress for 75 years, and many able committees have had before them the most distinguished and reliable men in the country. And my committee has called before us many public-health authorities and we have the benefit of the reports of all former committees, and we have inserted many of them in our hearings, which the Members ought to read, and they all say, and common sense tells us, that sunlight and natural daylight are not only beneficial but that they are absolutely necessary to perfect normal health. They are very much better for health and efficiency and comfort than artificial light.

They all also agree that natural, normal outdoor air containing humidity is better than living in this artificial air. But, of course, it must be properly heated in cold weather and should have in it a relative humidity of 30 to 50 per cent; and in summer it should be cooled to 15° below the outside air whenever the thermometer gets above 85°. The air must also be washed and be properly conditioned.

And for comfort we must, besides having the proper temperature all the time, also have a good breeze going through the Chamber all the time without any draft. These necessary conditions can not possibly be obtained by or with our present primative system, and they can and will be obtained only by the system we are proposing to install by this item in this bill. I have not said that the air in this Chamber is bad—although thousands of visitors to our galleries and a great many Members do say that—but I do say most positively that the air could be and should be made much better.

Mr. LINTHICUM. We have a new building with a system of ventilation by which the air is rapidly changed—can not that be done here?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is only one of a half dozen conditions that are necessary to comfort or to health either. Probably each of the 435 Members of this House will and should have his own idea about this matter. My deliberate judgment is that the mortality rate in both the Senate and House is much greater than it is in any other group of men of the same average age.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And yet with all the danger that surrounds seats in this House there are always numerous candidates for these 435 seats.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; and the fact that there are from 500 to 1,000 men and a large number of good women in every one of the 435 congressional districts in the United States who are most anxious to and would most eagerly take the chances of undermining their health or even losing their lives to come to Congress is a very salutary and fortunate condition for our country. The ease and celerity with which the people can obtain some one else to take our respective places in this Chamber is a marvelous incentive to efficieney and good conduct. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I thank the House for their very kind attention, and yield back the balance of the time, and insert the mortality statement that I referred to as follows [applause]:

During the past 35 years there have been 290 deaths in the service here in Congress—87 Senators and 203 Representatives have died in office. The average death rate of the Senators has been 4.6 per cent for each Congress, and the average death rate of Representatives has been 2.8 per cent for each Congress. Of the total membership of Congress, the Senate is now 18 per cent and the House 82 per cent. While the Senate sustains 30 per cent and the House only 70 per cent of the deaths, owing principally to the fact that the Senators' average age is several years older than the average age of the House Members.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I want to thank the members of the subcommittee who have served with me at this time for their splendid and whole-souled cooperation. I would like to have every Member of this House secure a copy of the hearings held before this committee. I think you will find information there with reference to the housekeeping establishment that will be very interesting to you.

This bill is the housekeeping bill of the legislative establishment. It has to do with the activities of legislation, and as you all know it has been the practice of the Committee on Appropriations to never attempt to do any legislating in the appropriation bill, but in this particular activity we find that there is no committee charged with preparing and presenting to the House legislation for the comfort and for the smooth running of the legislative establishment.

That being the case when the hearings are held before our committee we find some places where a little legislation is necessary. In this bill there are several places where we do a little legislating, but I assure the House that it is not the desire of this committee to usurp the powers of any committee. We are simply attempting to do a few things in this bill which will smooth the running of our own household. I do hope that every Member will read the hearings and I hope they will read the bill, and when they do that I am sure they will find no fault with the work of this committee or think for one minute that we are attempting to legislate when we have no right to do it.

As I said a moment ago this is the housekeeping bill of the legislative establishment. It covers activities of the Senate and the House of Representatives, the Capitol police, the Joint Committee on Printing, the Office of Legislative Counsel, the Architect of the Capitol, the Botanic Garden, the Library of Congress, and the Government Printing Office.

We do not think there is anything in this bill that is controversial. There are three big items in the bill. The first one is the item of ventilation and I am deeply indebted to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] for the splendid presentation of the matter that you have just listened to. By the way, you will be interested as you read the hearings to find that the bid for ventilating this Hall and the Senate Chamber is a trifle over $100,000 less than the bid was last year. The House is indebted to the great chairman of this committee [Mr. MADDEN] for his sagacious business judgment in not allowing the figures presented last year to carry any weight.

So to-day we come with a bill at $100,000 less than the same work would have cost if we had accepted the bid last year.

As the bill proceeds in its reading we hope to explain to you as best we can the ventilating system in detail. It will require for the two Chambers something like $325,000. Another item in the bill requires the expenditure of $387,000 for the completion of the Congressional Library. As you all know, they have built two great stacks in the courtyard of that magnificent structure, and these stacks are not completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. I yield myself five minutes more. The librarian, Doctor Putnam, made his case so clear before our committee that we felt inclined to follow his suggestion, and we have included in this bill an appropriation of $387,000 for the purpose of completing that structure and thereby give room for the activities that are actually being thrust upon this wonderful institution. People who are enthusiasts are presenting to the Congressional Library unusual sums of money for various activities and books that are beyond price. They must be taken care of, and to be able to do this work of administration Doctor Putnam made such a good case as to the needs of the Library that the committee unanimously voted to appropriate $387,000.

I might say, for the benefit of the Members of the House, that this bill as reported here is a unanimous report of our committee. We have labored long upon it. We have tried to get information for you all, and we hope when the bill is taken up for reading under the five-minute rule that you will agree with the committee in the several attempts at legislation. We hope that you will see the matter the same way that the committee looked at it, and realize that we are not attempting to take from any committee of this House the right to legislate.

In the hearings as they progressed we did find some inequalities. For instance, in the Sergeant at Arms' office we found there a man styled as a messenger, at a salary of $1,720 a year, handling $5,000,000 of the Government's money. We found this man who was getting only $1,720 a year bonding himself and paying for his own bond. We have done a little legislating there, or have attempted to. That is, we recommend to the House that this position be changed from that of messenger to assistant cashier, and we recommend the raising of the salary from $1,720 a year to $2,500 a year. We have also in the bill suggested the raising of the salary of the cashier from $4,000 to $4,500 per year. Also we found that the Sergeant at Arms' office did not need a stenographer; that is, did not need to use one constantly. Therefore, we have abolished the office of stenographer and instead of appropriating $1,200 a year, which was paid to the stenographer, we have only allowed $600 a year, saving $600 on this item. We know that is legislation and that it is subject to a point of order. We are just coming to this Chamber to talk over our housekeeping affairs with the Members of the House, hoping that the House will agree with its committee that has had this matter in charge. We hope that no point of order will be made against these small items that simply go toward smoothing out the housekeeping problem of our own establishment.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take up any more time. I thank the Members of the House for their courtesy. The afternoon is going to be consumed in very large measure with general debate. I hope, however, toward the close of the afternoon, that we will be able to begin reading the bill. I hope for the cooperation of every Member of the House, especially when it comes to the items that are subject to points of order. We know they are subject to points of order, but I trust that you will help us put our house in order so that it will run smoothly and pleasantly. We have not attempted to raise salaries in a horizontal manner all through the Government. We could not do that. We do think that our hearings are so clear and comprehensive that they will appeal to your intelligence and suggest to you the fairness and wisdom of our efforts to do something for our own establishment. I thank you. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I desire to call the attention of the House this afternoon to legislation that is pending concerning the Federal courts. This legislation is made necessary by the conduct of many of our Federal judges. When there is a vacancy on the Federal bench, lawyers in that particular jurisdiction commence getting busy in order to get the appointment. They obtain all kinds of indorsements to show their qualifications, to prove that they have "judicial temperament," proof of their legal ability and of their impartial attitude. Finally, when one is selected and confirmed by the Senate and sworn in, he is not on the bench a year before he has been transformed into an entirely different human being. The arrogance that is assumed by a large number of Federal judges is simply beyond description. This conduct becomes contagious, so that it is the exception to find a Federal judge who is satisfied with being a judge in the real, legal sense of the word and who is courteous and considerate in the discharge of his duties. Judges take it upon themselves to correct legislation, to interpret and construe laws to fit particular cases, to govern business, to manage public-utility corporations, and to run the communities generally. This condition that I am talking about exists in many jurisdictions. Only recently the Legislature of the State of Indiana passed a concurrent resolution and sent it to the Congress, seeking relief from the Federal courts that are interfering with the supervision of State public service commissions, over purely local public service or utility companies. A domestic corporation in a State carrying on a public business locally under franchise of a municipality or a State, is naturally under the supervision of a State public service or utility commission, but often it seeks to avoid supervision and regulation of the State and, without any justification in fact or in law, run to the Federal court for protection to which they are not entitled. We have now the same situation in New York City, where companies operating subways owned by the city of New York, operating entirely within the State under a contract with the city of New York, after having sought legislation to modify the contract, and after seeking before the public transit commission a modification of the terms of the contract in order to increase fares, have sneaked to the Federal court to restrain the transit commission from issuing orders—to be relieved of the terms of the contract entered into with the city of New York so that they may charge an increased fare. Whether in Indiana or in New York, or in any other State, no public-utility company doing purely an intrastate business goes to the Federal courts with honest purposes. That is a very strong statement to make, and I am going to repeat it.

No public-service company, whether it be gas, transportation, electric light or what not, doing solely an intrastate business, goes to the Federal courts with honest purposes. State courts have complete jurisdiction. These companies know that if they have a just complaint or a just grievance they can resort to their own State courts. If a constitutional question is involved, a public-service corporation may invoke the protection of the Federal court, but only after it has exhausted its remedy in the State court and the State court's decision in construing the State statute or the question involved deprives the corporation of a constitutional right. There are no constitutional questions involved in the Indiana cases. There can be no constitutional question involved in the Interborough and Brooklyn-Manhattan case now in the Federal court. As I said before, that is simply a question of a contract between the city of New York and these companies and the companies attempt, together and in conspiracy with stock manipulators, gamblers, politicians, and other riffraff, to avoid the terms of the contract and to find a way to charge millions of people using the subways every day an increased fare. It is, without doubt, the most outrageous, the most dishonest, the most brazen attempt to violate the law, to violate the terms of a contract, to rob the public of millions of dollars and to use the Federal court in aid of this dirty work. These public-service corporations go to Federal courts because they know they have no just claims. They go there if they know they can handle and control the Federal judge and get the remedy that they seek.

Gentlemen, it is an outrageous condition. Do you wonder that millions of people in this country are losing confidence in the Federal courts?

Mr. CELLER. That is a strong statement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You bet it is a strong statement, I will say to my colleague from New York. It is a very strong statement, and I mean it. Federal judges have become messenger boys, and to use a military phrase, or rather an Army term, they have become "dog robbers" for public-service companies. How can you explain it to the average citizen? They are not State courts. They are courts which they were taught to believe have civil jurisdiction in cases only between citizens of different States. How can you explain the action of these companies going into a Federal court in the first instance? You say a constitutional question is involved. Yes; suppose there is. But under ordinary procedure the constitutional question may be raised only after all remedies have been exhausted in the State courts.

We had the disgraceful condition of the State of New York passing a gas law and the gas company going into the Federal court and the court appointing a master and the master hearing testimony and deciding in favor of the gas company and receiving such an exorbitant fee that the Supreme Court of the United States said that it was indecent. Then the master was ordered to return a part of the fee, but refused to do it, and said the gas company did not want any money back. Of course, the gas company did not want any money back.

Only recently a drastic order was made by the Federal court to carry out its mandate. Federal judges have appointed their wives and daughters to positions as confidential secretaries. They have gone out to settle in their own way labor disputes by issuing outrageous injunctions. A study of the law of injunctions will reveal this disgraceful state of facts—that you have one set of rules and one law respecting injunctions on matters against labor, and another set of rules and laws when labor is not involved.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have a bill—the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself have a bill—pending before the Committee on the Judiciary on the question of injunctions. We have a bill first introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey and which I have introduced for the past six years, preventing the Federal courts from meddling with municipal matters and interfering with State commissions or officials regulating public-service corporations. We have a bill to grant a jury trial in cases of contempt. A judge loses his temper and, because a lawyer asserts his rights on behalf of his client, then and there disbars the lawyer. A judge with a nasty temper and a mean disposition acting like a tyrant on the bench, resents the conduct of any individual, is prejudiced against an individual, feels that he, the judge, has been offended, and then and there punishes a citizen for contempt and commits him to jail. A judge who has not sufficient control, who can not restrain himself, and who gets into a quarrel with a litigant or a lawyer certainly can not pass upon the question of contempt. Why, these judges require a humility on the part of litigants and lawyers that makes the situation ridiculous. Everybody must stand in awe of the judge. Yes; and lawyers are compelled to laugh at the silly, inane jokes of a stupid judge or else incur the disfavor of his honor. Jury trial has become merely, in many instances, a matter of form. The judges have a jury because the Constitution compels it. But many are the judges that usurp the functions and duties of the jury. They take it upon themselves to characterize witnesses to give their judgment of the guilt or innocence of the defendant; these judges take from the jury the question of credibility of witnesses, and they stamp each witness according to their, the judges', views. Many are the cases that if the jury does not bring in a verdict in accordance with the viewpoint of the judge the members of the jury are denounced, insulted, and abused in open court. There are many bills pending in this House which would tend to bring about much-needed reform in our Federal court. It is for that reason that I am bringing these facts to the attention of the House. The trouble is that everyone seems to be afraid of even mentioning a judge. I have respect for the court. It is because I have that respect for the court that I believe the courts should be so conducted and the men on the bench should be of such irreproachable character and of such high standing as to command and retain the continued respect of the American people for the court and confidence in the court. I am not impressed with the assumed, artificial dignity and intolerable arrogance displayed by many judges. If a man was once an ambulance chaser and a shyster, he remains that, and a certificate of appointment and confirmation will not change his character. I shall continue to refer to conditions in the Federal court from time to time. I know that the public and the bar are suffering from these conditions, and we must bring about the much-needed reform.

Now, if this intolerable condition continues the very backbone of our Government, the Federal courts, in which the people must have confidence, will be destroyed. I think these judges ought to be brought to task, because every lawyer who practices before a Federal judge is scared to death, as is evidenced by my colleague from New York [Mr. CELLER], who was shaking when I criticized the Federal courts in New York. Every lawyer who has to go before these judges is scared. If the gentleman from Brooklyn wants to defend the proposed 7-cent fare, he can do so. I do not care. I am not afraid to appear before any judge, because I know that the conditions I am describing exist not only in my own jurisdiction, in my district, but all over the country.

Mr. CELLER. While I agree with what the gentleman has said, the gentleman knows that I have seen, eye for eye, with him the evils of the Federal bench. But the gentleman has brought a general indictment against all the Federal judges, whereas the gentleman knows that a great many of them do not come within the category he describes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I said the majority of them were arrogant and that they assumed to themselves the duty of controlling local and municipal matters, which they have no right to do.

Mr. SCHAFER. Would it not be a good thing to provide that the judges would hold only for a certain specified term and be elected directly by the people?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, yes. The gentleman knows that the small minority of people who live on special privileges in this country who once controlled legislation now realize that they have lost their control of legislatures and go to the courts for what they want. That is the very condition I have been describing. "Let Congress or State legislatures do what they want as long as we control the bench" is the slogan of special privilege to-day.

The latest fad in judicial stunts is for the judge to create the impression that he is enforcing the law. By imposing long prison terms on few individuals who are unable to pay the services of great lawyers, records are established for great severity. "Oh, I am a stern judge," is their favorite self praise. When they are criticized for being partial to powerful corporations, for assisting in fare grabs, or boosting gas rates, they immediately claim that it is because of their severity in meting out punishment to maintain law and order that they are being criticized. Jail sentences are summed up in terms of thousands of years in order to detract attention where violations of law on a large scale and really important serious violations and big criminals are let off with slight punishment. It is a sort of a way of balancing the books, this adding of severe sentences imposed on the meek and the humble. Only recently out in Minnesota a judge took the trustees of one of the lodges of a great fraternal organization and sent all of these trustees, one of them an elderly man, to jail for one year for acts committed in the clubroom—to be specific, for drinking in the clubroom—about which, perhaps, the trustees had no knowledge. I refer to the great Order of Eagles. Now, if all the trustees of all the select clubs of my city and State, Minnesota, or any other State where drinking is going on, would be sent to jail, believe me, our foremost citizens would be wearing stripes and the social register could be used as the index for Atlanta. I will invite the same judge to be as stern, to enforce the law as vigorously, to every club and association or organization to which he or his set belongs. I will invite him to get after the trustees of the golf clubs and to inspect the nineteenth hole of his and all the select golf clubs in the country. Let us see how many men will be sent to jail for being trustees of golf clubs or social clubs where the nineteenth hole is popular. [Laughter.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. What is the nineteenth hole?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman ever played golf? It is the most attractive hole. [Laughter.]

Seriously, gentlemen, it is difficult to discipline a judge. There is only one way in which it can be done, and that is by impeachment; and in order to establish an impeachment you must be able to prove the commission of a high crime or misdemeanor. There is a tendency on the part of the House, and properly so, to go slow on these questions of impeachment. These judges are not subject to any other discipline, with the result that these fellows—who break their necks to get their appointments; who literally cringe and crawl on their hands and knees to get their appointments—establish themselves as the rulers of a whole community, well knowing that there is no one to check up on them; that they are not responsible for anything; and they are just good enough and shrewd enough lawyers to know how to keep from the danger of impeachment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HADLEY). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield me two minutes?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Missouri two minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I only rise to reply in a word to the statement made by my colleague on the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from New York. I agree with him that there are some members of the Federal judiciary who have acted badly in office and whose appointments ought not to have been made, but I deny that the judiciary as a whole, or any large part of it, is of the character or temperament which the gentleman from New York has described. He states that a large majority of the judiciary are men who are unfit, by reason of their actions, or by reason of their work in the courts, to hold their high office. I deny that, Mr. Chairman. I believe that the judiciary of our country is of a very high order and of a very high character in all respects, with the exception, as I say, that there are some men who have been selected whose qualifications were not such in the first instance as to give them the right to have such an appointment, and some few of them have usurped authority which is not theirs under the law and Constitution, but that is bound to happen when there are many men to be appointed, as there have been many men appointed to the Federal judiciary, and especially when you take into consideration the fact that the President in a large number of cases depends on the advice and judgment of other men, because he can not know all of the applicants he appoints to office. Oftentimes he takes the recommendations and judgment of Members of the other branch of the Congress and perhaps of some Members of this House, and in doing that he is most likely bound to make a mistake here and there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. DYER. But, Mr. Chairman, there is a way for the gentleman from New York, if he knows of a judge in his city who is violating his oath of office or who is issuing injunctions that he is not permitted to issue under the law—there is a way for him and for any Member of this House to rid the country of that kind of a judge, and that is to have the courage to stand upon this floor and impeach him instead of attacking the whole judiciary of our Government. [Applause.] In this Nation we must depend upon the judiciary for the enforcement of law and order, and when a Member of this House takes upon himself the responsibility of attacking the whole judiciary, or a great majority of it, in my judgment he is doing a thing that is not for the best interests of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very glad the gentleman from New York has made his speech this afternoon, and I am very glad he has made some pertinent remarks about our Federal judiciary. Of course, I must take issue with him when he brings a wholesale indictment against all the members of the judiciary, and I am very glad he modified his remarks by saying that he directed those remarks against some of them but not all.

It is quite true, gentlemen, that in New York we suffer from the stealing of jurisdiction, as it were, on the part of the Federal courts of matters which are wholly within our State. When the city of New York attempted to insure for its people a 5-cent fare on the traction and subway lines it is the Federal court which insists upon jurisdiction by virtue of an enactment which we passed some years ago. That must give us pause, and we must consider whether or not that statute should be repealed, the statute which takes away from our State courts the right to determine whether a purely local matter shall be solved in local courts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is not the question. It is a question of contract.

Mr. CELLER. I am glad the gentleman corrected me. The city has a contract with the traction system that it will not charge more than 5 cents, yet it seeks to avoid its just obligation under that contract, and it is very significant that the minute that case went into the Federal courts the stocks and bonds of those companies greatly appreciated in value, and those who speculated on the New York Stock Exchange in Brooklyn-Manhattan Transit securities or in Interborough Rapid Transit securities found they made great profits. When the case was taken to the Federal courts the stock went up. It was generally conceded that the Federal court would undoubtedly render, as it always has thus far, decisions favorable to public utility and service companies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, Congress has made a football of Muscle Shoals continuously for the past eight years, but I hope that the game is about over and provision will be made before the adjournment of Congress for the operation of the Muscle Shoals plant in the manner and for the purposes provided by the act of 1916, which authorized this development. [Applause.]

There was incorporated in the national defense act of June 20, 1916, nitrate section 124, at the urgent request of the War Department and the farm organizations of the country, and as a result the plant at Muscle Shoals was afterwards constructed for two fundamental purposes, namely: For the manufacture of explosives in times of war and fertilizer in peace times. Congress appropriated about $120,000,000 for this development with the distinct understanding that it should be used for these two purposes. The act expressly provides that—

> The plant or plants provided under this act shall be constructed and operated solely by the Government and not in conjunction with any other industry or enterprise carried on by private capital.

The nitrate plant and the hydroelectric power development constitute one plant.

While the organic act, which is still in force, provides for the operation of this plant by the Government, still the sentiment in Congress has been divided as to whether it shall be operated by the Government or by a lessee.

Many bills have been before Congress, some providing for Government operation and some for a lease, but none up to this time have met with the approval of both Houses of Congress.

All bills providing for private operation at this and former sessions of Congress have been rejected. Most of the members of the committees of Congress having jurisdiction of Muscle Shoals may be expected to be members of these committees during the next Congress, hence we could not reasonably expect them to favor bills providing for leases which have been rejected at this session.

The Senate recently passed Senate Joint Resolution 46, introduced by Senator NORRIS, providing for Government operation through the Secretary of Agriculture. The House Committee on Military Affairs, to which it was referred, has reported to the House, by an almost unanimous vote, the Morin bill as a substitute for the Norris bill, providing for Government operation through a Government operating corporation, known as the Muscle Shoals Corporation of the United States, and authorized the construction of Cove Creek Dam. I regret that the committee did not also include Dam No. 3.

While Muscle Shoals is located in the district which I have had the honor to represent for a number of years, it is not local but nation-wide in its scope and purposes. I have heretofore supported bills providing for private operation through a lease, but it is now evident to every Member of Congress who is informed on the subject that it is to be Government operation or nothing. The fertilizer plants have remained idle since the war ended, the power is running to waste, so I am in favor of the House substitute for the Senate bill. I am in favor of certain amendments, especially so as to give municipalities priority rights to purchase surplus power, as provided in the Senate bill, and I hope that this amendment will be made before the bill is finally passed.

The country is justly criticizing Congress for not providing for the operation of Muscle Shoals. Many bills of less importance have been and are being considered. If this question is not settled at this session it can not be said that it is for want of time. Members of the Military Affairs Committee and others are urging the Committee on Rules to provide a time for the consideration of this bill. The subject has been before Congress for years. The committee which reported this bill has given months of its time at this and former sessions to this subject. The Morin bill has been reported to the House by an almost unanimous vote. It is a bill of national importance. Every section of the country is expecting it to be settled at this session. The distinguished members of the Rules Committee in a spirit of fairness are expected to give the House an opportunity to vote on the question. It would be most unusual to deny the House this privilege. So I feel justified in assuming and expecting that a rule will be provided at a very early date. [Applause.]

Nitrogen, phosphate, and potash constitute the plant food in all fertilizer, nitrogen being the principal. The most of the nitrogen used by the American farmers is imported from Chile. Since 1884 there has been imported into this country 20,101,425 long tons of Chilean nitrate, for which was paid the enormous sum of $795,573,104. On each ton of this Chilean nitrate there was paid to the Chilean Government $12.53 per long ton as an export duty. This amounted to about $250,000,000, at least 75 per cent of which was paid by the American farmers.

In 1926 there was imported into the United States 914,294 long tons of Chilean nitrate, for which was paid $42,781,386. On this there was paid to the Chilean Government $12.53 per long ton as export duty, which amounted to more than $11,000,000. A ton of Chilean nitrate contains only 15½ per cent nitrogen, which amounts to 310 pounds per ton. It now costs about $50 per ton at the port, and is selling in my district in north Alabama at $64 per ton to the individual farmer, and at about $57 per long ton through the cooperatives.

Cyanamide contains 470 pounds of nitrogen per ton, being 23½ per cent nitrogen. Fertilizer mixers are paying 7.8 cents per pound for cyanamide nitrogen and 15½ cents per pound for Chilean nitrates at the port, and are selling fertilizer to the farmers containing Chilean nitrates and cyanamide nitrogen at the same price. On the basis of 7.8 cents per pound for nitrogen a ton of cyanamide nitrogen containing 310 pounds of nitrates would cost $24.18, whereas a ton of Chilean nitrates is costing the farmers in my district $64 per ton. Shall Congress force the American farmers to continue to pay tribute to this Chilean monopoly to the amount of an average of more than $11,000,000 each year? Or shall Congress do for the American farmers what Germany has done for the German farmers and provide for a domestic supply of nitrogen by the operation by the Government of the nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals?

Freight on concentrated fertilizer such as ammo-phos containing about 50 per cent plant food would be only about one-fourth the amount paid on ordinary commercial fertilizer containing from 12 to 16 per cent of plant food. But the most remarkable saving in the use of concentrated fertilizer would be in the reduction in acreage and labor. Besides, the economic value resulting from better-living conditions of the farmers of the Nation can not be estimated.

The enactment of this bill into law does not mean the Government going into business at Muscle Shoals. It is already in business there. The Government built, paid for, and owns the entire development, and is now operating part of it—that is, the power plant, and will continue to do so if this bill fails to become a law, and neither the farmers nor anyone else would be benefited by the operation of the power plant as heretofore, except the Alabama Power Co. The Alabama Power Co. is taking just such power as it wishes at its own price, about 2 mills per kilowatt, and will continue to do so if Congress adjourns without action. The power company has made no reduction in power rates by reason of the purchase of this power. The Government is operating the power plant; why can not it also operate the fertilizer plant? Nitrate plant No. 2, using the cyanamide process, is the best and largest in the world. The cyanamide process is one of the best, and, in fact, I believe is the best for a location like Muscle Shoals where there is cheap power and all of the raw materials in great abundance in close proximity. Cyanamide process is producing ten times as much nitrogen as it did 15 years ago. That disproves all of the propaganda which has been broadcast by selfish interests that it is obsolete. I visited a plant of the American Cyanamid Co. using the cyanamide process in Canada last summer, and also the mixing plant of this company at Warner, N. J. It has been and is still doing a good and successful business and making a splendid grade of highly concentrated fertilizer known as ammo-phos, containing about 50 per cent plant food, and paying dividends to its stockholders.

It is being operated under very much less favorable conditions than exist at Muscle Shoals. Plants using the cyanamide process in Germany and other countries are being operated successfully, some by the Government and others by private capital. Germany is operating its war nitrogen plants of different processes, including the cyanamide, in the manufacture of fertilizer for the benefit of agriculture, and has met with such success that Germany is now independent of Chilean nitrates, and instead of being an importer of nitrates is a large exporter. We are now importing nitrogen from Germany. Nitrogen produced by the cyanamide process is the cheapest that can be obtained at this time. What Germany has done for the German farmers in furnishing them a cheaper and better grade of fertilizer and relieving them of the burdens of the Chilean monopoly can and should be done by Congress for the American farmers. [Applause.]

Operation by the Government at Muscle Shoals does not mean, so far as the production of air nitrogen is concerned, entering into competition with private capital, for the reason that private capital is not engaged in the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen for fertilizer purposes anywhere in the United States, and only one place on the Western Hemisphere—that is Canada. And we have no reason to expect that this will be done any time in the near future. Such plants in operation and being built in the United States produce nitrogen for other purposes than fertilizer.

The price of fertilizer is now higher than heretofore and the demand is greater than the supply, so it can not be claimed that Government operation at Muscle Shoals will put the fertilizer people out of business, but will increase the supply and reduce the price. The demand for fertilizer is and will continue to increase from year to year as plant food is being continually extracted from the soil by growing crops and must be replenished. There was 4,955,931 tons of fertilizer used in the United States in 1921 and 7,507,552 tons in 1926—an increase of 2,651,621 tons in five years.

If the present legislation is enacted into law providing for the operation by the Government, it may not be perfect, but it could be amended by Congress from time to time as may be necessary. Neither does it close the gates providing for a lease and private operation by Congress hereafter. The law of 1916, which authorized the development at Muscle Shoals, expressly provides that the plant should be operated by the Government for the benefit of national defense and agriculture. If such had not been the provision of the law, it may be that Congress would not have appropriated the necessary funds for this development. While I prefer private operation and have supported bills providing for such operation, since that can not be done I am anxious to see Government operation tried out. It may be a success; as to this we will not know until a trial is made. If it is not a success, it can be discontinued by Congress. If the President selects a good board of directors, as we have the right to believe and expect that he will, it may accomplish all that is claimed by the advocates of Government operation. Government operation at Muscle Shoals would be nothing new. The Government is now operating the Panama Canal, Shipping Board, United States Fleet Corporation, Mississippi and Warrior River Barge Line, the Post Office Department, arsenals, the ship and navy yards, and parcel post, and is in business in many other ways.

In the Morin bill it provides that a Government operating corporation be organized with $10,000,000 capital furnished by the Government with a board of five directors, not more than three of whom shall be of the same political party, having no interest in any public-utility corporation engaged in the business of distributing or selling power to the public, nor in any corporation engaged in the manufacture, selling, or distribution of fertilizer or ingredients thereof, and who profess and believe in the feasibility and wisdom of this bill appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, with authority to select a general manager who has demonstrated his ability as a business executive and who shall have authority to appoint two assistant managers, one possessed of knowledge and experience to render him an expert in fertilizer, and the other trained and experienced in the field of production and distribution of hydroelectric power. The salaries provided for the directors and managers should command the services of men of ability. The bill authorizes and directs the corporation to operate the existing facilities at Muscle Shoals at their full capacity and add to the same from time to time as may be deemed advisable; to sell and distribute the fertilizer equitably among the States; and to sell the same at actual cost of production for the first five years, and afterwards at cost plus 4 per cent per annum only on money hereafter paid in as capital stock.

In the cost of production nothing will be included for the use of the nitrate plant or power plant. No electric power shall be considered surplus so long as it can be profitably used in the manufacture of fertilizer and the net proceeds from the sale of surplus power shall be used to the end of providing fertilizer at as reasonably low cost as possible. It also provides for the distribution of surplus electric power equitably among the States within transmission distance of Muscle Shoals. It is a fertilizer bill and not a power bill; no one can disprove that statement.

The Government corporation is to be very similar to the ordinary private business corporation, except the Government is the only stockholder and the directors are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate and to report to Congress annually, while directors of private corporations are selected by and report to the stockholders.

The Morin bill does not commit the Government to this mode of operation for any fixed length of time, but is expressly subject to repeal at any time without any embarrassment to the Government on account of existing contracts with any person, firm, or corporation. Consequently a lease with any private operating agency could be negotiated and executed, and the private lessee take over the property and assume control, and thus enter into possession without ever stopping a wheel or delaying one minute the manufacture of fertilizer or munitions, or the distribution of power. That could be done one year from now or at any time that a satisfactory contract could be obtained from a private operating agency. The President of the United States under the Morin bill turns over to the corporation the use of the entire plant. The title does not pass out of the Government into the corporation and it can be taken back at any time.

The farmers are not concerned about whether fertilizer is made at Muscle Shoals by the Government or by a lessee. They are interested in securing a cheaper and better grade of fertilizer as they have had reason to expect since Muscle Shoals was developed. The farmers can not understand this delay and why Congress can not put these plants into operation. How can any Member of Congress who is interested in providing relief for the farmers in their distressed condition fail to support this measure which provides for the manufacture and sale direct to the farmers and farm organizations of fertilizer at the actual cost of operation?

The offers which have been made to lease Muscle Shoals authorized the lessee in fixing the price of fertilizer to include not only the cost of production and 4 per cent interest on the cost of the water-power development but also 8 per cent profit additional. While the bill provides for only $10,000,000 capital, still it authorizes the appropriation of such further amounts as may be hereafter necessary to carry out the purposes of the bill, such appropriations being made as may be necessary from time to time just as appropriations are made for river and harbor improvements and many other things. We have reason to believe that if this bill passes the House—and it seems to be the general opinion that it will when a rule is provided giving the House an opportunity to vote on it—the conferees when appointed will reconcile the differences between the two Houses and will make a report which will be adopted.

Since the hydroelectric plant at Dam No. 2 was completed it has been operated by the War Department through the Chief of Engineers. The only customer for the power is the Alabama Power Co. This company has been taking a small part of the power, about 70,000 horsepower, paying about 2 mills kilowatt under a temporary contract. The balance runs to waste. The power company has not and will not reduce its power rates by reason of the purchase of this power from the Government but will continue to purchase it at about 2 mills kilowatt and to sell it for domestic purposes at 10 cents kilowatt for lighting purposes if this bill is not enacted into law at this session. Of course the company makes a cheaper industrial rate and in homes where it is used for other than lighting purposes. This condition will continue if Congress adjourns without passing this legislation. This may be one of the reasons why the power lobby is here trying to defeat this bill. The water-power monopoly in that section of the country has undertaken all along to convert this development into a commercial water-power proposition and not allow it to be used for the manufacture of fertilizer.

It will be remembered that this same interest opposed and helped to defeat the offer made by Henry Ford for Muscle Shoals. The Fertilizer Trust is opposed to the manufacture of fertilizer at Muscle Shoals either by the Government or a lessee. The fertilizer lobby is still here trying to defeat this legislation and the fertilizer companies are flooding the Members of Congress with telegrams asking them not only to oppose the passage of the bill but asking them to prevent the granting of a rule for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. I will be glad to yield to my friend from Baltimore.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I represent a city that has very large fertilizer plants, and I want to know whether the gentleman thinks the Government ought to go into the manufacture of fertilizer in competition with private companies.

Mr. ALMON. I certainly think that the Government is more than justified in the operation of Muscle Shoals plant for the manufacture of fertilizer in accordance with the act of 1916, which authorized this development. It is the only way that I know of to relieve the farmers of the burdens of the Chilean nitrate monopoly and secure a cheaper and better grade of fertilizer.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want the gentleman to go into it because I do not know what to tell my people.

Mr. ALMON. As far as the manufacture of air nitrogen by the Government at Muscle Shoals is concerned it would not necessarily amount to competition with the fertilizer companies for they are not engaged in the manufacture of nitrogen, neither would the manufacture of a highly concentrated fertilizer at Muscle Shoals necessarily be in competition with the fertilizer companies because they are not engaged in the manufacture of this grade of fertilizer. However, I do not wish to be understood as claiming that the manufacture of fertilizer at Muscle Shoals by this Government operating corporation will not amount to competition with the fertilizer companies. They have no competition now. While they may claim there is no Fertilizer Trust, still they all sell the same grade of fertilizer at the same price. This is in effect a trust.

They all depend chiefly on the Chilean nitrate monopoly for a supply of nitrogen. So it would seem that the Government would be thoroughly justified in entering into competition with the fertilizer industry, just as it does in many other kinds of business when it is necessary to protect the interest of the people.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that all that is proposed to do under the present bill is to manufacture nitrates?

Mr. ALMON. No; this bill would authorize the corporation to manufacture fertilizer and to buy such ingredients for fertilizer as might be desired to make a good grade of fertilizer. It carries out the provisions of the original act of 1916 to which I have referred.

If this plant is not operated in peace times for the manufacture of fertilizer it would be out of date and of little value in the event it should be needed for war purposes. After the experience of the World War no nation of importance will depend upon a foreign supply of nitrogen for munition purposes. Germany could not have prosecuted the war after her supply of Chilean nitrates was cut off if it had not already provided for a domestic supply of nitrates. If the Germans could have succeeded in destroying the Panama Canal our supply of Chilean nitrates would have been cut off and we would have been forced to depend, very largely, on the Muscle Shoals plant for a supply of nitrogen for explosives.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The same argument was made when the Government undertook to establish a powder factory. It was then said that if the Government established a powder factory it would drive the private factories out of business. The Government factory was established, however, and the powder factories did not go out of business and were not put out of business, but the price came down.

Mr. ALMON. Yes; and the same thing will no doubt happen as to fertilizer if Congress will authorize the Government to operate the Muscle Shoals plant.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Assuming that the Muscle Shoals project was in the district of either Member here, would he not be just like you, asking that something be done with this property?

Mr. ALMON. Yes; each of you have the same interest in this that I have. It will be nation-wide in its effect as it applies to national defense and agriculture.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes; I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The gentleman has spoken of his visit to Canada. Can he tell us of his experience, which bears out his argument? The Government operation there supplies the power to the consumer at a much lower rate than private concerns.

Mr. ALMON. Yes; I found that Government and municipal ownership and operation of hydroelectric power plants in the Province of Ontario, Canada, is a wonderful success and has come to stay. The rates are about one-fifth as much as the average rates in the United States.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. And is not that the reason why the power companies of America are opposing this bill providing for Government operation at Muscle Shoals?

Mr. ALMON. We know that the power interests and their lobbies are here, not only opposing the passage of this bill, but also to prevent a rule to provide for the consideration of the bill by the House. The fertilizer lobby is doing the same thing.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. How much does the Alabama Power Co. charge?

Mr. ALMON. Ten cents per kilowatt for domestic lighting purposes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. And in Canada it is 2 cents per kilowatt.

Mr. ALMON. The power at Muscle Shoals was developed to operate the plant and not for industrial purposes. It is not needed for industrial purposes, but if it should be there can be developed 3,350,000 horsepower more on the Tennessee River and its tributaries, as is shown by report of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department as the result of a recent survey. So the water-power interest should keep their hands off this power and not try to defeat the Government from using it, or so much of it as may be needed for the proper operation of the plant for the purposes for which it was constructed. If more power is needed for industrial purposes let the power companies develop it. [Applause.]

Let no Member of this House be frightened by the opposition to this measure on the ground that it is competition with private capital and will put the fertilizer companies out of business. The same argument was made when Congress provided for parcel post, which was in direct competition with the express companies. That was found to be necessary to secure reasonable transportation rates and has saved the people of the United States many millions of dollars, and at the same time the express companies are still in business. Parcel post is competition with private American capital. This bill provides competition with foreign capital, the Chilean monopoly, which is foreign interest. A monopoly which controls the price of all nitrogen used for fertilizer purposes. This kind of an argument is nothing new. We have heard it for a long time. The fertilizer companies made the same argument against the offer of Henry Ford for Muscle Shoals. It is competition that they are opposed to—whether it be Government operation or private operation. [Applause.] Henry Ford would be operating Muscle Shoals to-day had it not been for the opposition of the fertilizer monopoly and the Alabama Power Co. and other water-power interests.

We hear much these days about farm relief legislation. There is no relief which they need worse than an adequate supply of a good grade of fertilizer at a reasonable price. That is the object and purpose of this legislation. The farmers and farm organizations have urged Congress for the past eight years to provide for the operation of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture of fertilizer for their benefit. I appeal to you to respond to their call and help to secure the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

All legislation which has been considered by Congress since the war ended looking to a utilization of the Muscle Shoals for the benefit of agriculture whether it be private or Government operation, has met with the strenuous opposition of the power and fertilizer interests. The power interest has tried to have it converted into a power proposition and the fertilizer interest has opposed, for selfish interest, the manufacture of fertilizer at Muscle Shoals, either by the Government or a lessee, and hence we are not surprised that the power lobby and the fertilizer lobby are doing everything in their power to defeat this bill.

We are now confronted with the question as to whether we will put this plant into operation for the benefit of the farmers, as we promised to do, and as the farmers have a right to expect we will do, or shall we let the power company continue to buy such of the power as it may desire at its own price, and the balance run to waste, and allow the fertilizer plants to continue to remain idle and allow the Chilean monopoly to continue to rob the American farmers and force them to buy a low grade of fertilizer and pay more than it is worth and more than they can afford to pay, considering the price they receive for farm products produced by them. Let each Member of this House decide this for himself, and account to his constituents for his course. Speaking for myself, I will support and vote for this bill with the hope and expectation that it will pass and preserve the Government's investment at Muscle Shoals and prove a great blessing to the American farmers. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, in the interesting hearings on this bill the committee will find on page 179 a statement made by the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Lynn, in answer to the question whether there were any suggestions he had to make with respect to the completion of the Capitol. He said:

> The extension of the east front, new sculpture for the east pediment, refacing the west front in marble, replacing the iron dome in marble, renewing the west steps in granite, repairing the Marshall monument on the west front—

And so forth. That suggestion of Mr. Lynn is not new, and I am addressing you now for the practical purpose of engaging your attention and I hope subsequently your influence in behalf of the program of Mr. Lynn.

I may say that the subject is not one which has come to me from a reading of these hearings. Some gentlemen may recall that I have briefly outlined this subject before in some five-minute debate in the House. The suggestions are in conformity to a report of a joint commission made March 3, 1905, comprised, on the part of the Senate, of George Peabody Wetmore, chairman, R. A. Alger, and A. P. Gorman, and on the House side J. G. Cannon, W. P. Hepburn, and James B. Richardson. So some 10 years ago, in 1918, to be accurate, I offered a bill, and have persistently renewed it at each subsequent session, to carry into effect the report of this joint commission. This joint commission gave very profound study to the subject of the completion of the Capitol, and their final report approved the plan submitted by Carrére & Hastings, very eminent men in their profession, and I understand approved by other eminent architects.

Briefly, the Capitol has never been completed. The dominant structure between the Senate wing and the House wing is built of sandstone, which has been painted from time to time. The two wings are marble. The bill which I offered contemplates the accomplishment of the following: A resurfacing of the old Capitol with marble to form a harmonious surface association with the two wings; veneer it, if you choose to call it that. That will not be a very expensive project.

Primarily, my attention was drawn to this by reason of the inadequate quarters of the Supreme Court. That, however, is no longer an object of consideration, as we have voted to build a structure devoted entirely to that court, which will be located across the way, as you so well know.

The dome of this Capitol is a source of offense to the eye and, perhaps, involves some insecurity to the structure itself. If you will go to the window at the end of the Hall and look out you will see that the dome of the Capitol projects itself on the east side beyond its apparent support. A portion of it, whatever it may be, its rim or whatnot, rests upon the pediment or roof that shelters the portico. Mr. Walter, whose name has been mentioned this morning, and who was the great Architect of this Capitol, had his own plans. He desired to extend the east front just as the west front had been extended, but time is wiser than man and it has developed that the present east front is preferable to anything that can now be designed, unmarred by a slight necessary extension, which I will mention in a moment. There is no one place around this Capitol where one can see the dome of the Capitol in all of its proportions except on the east front. So it is thought by many architects to be unfortunate to impair such a complete and adequate view of the dome of the Capitol by an extension that would even partially obstruct that view, but the architects all agree that you can extend the east front 12 or 14 feet, which would amply support the dome and not interfere at all with the full view of the dome itself.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Was this construction in accordance with the architect's design?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think so.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say that the marble of which these two wings are constructed came from the district of my colleague, Mr. COLE, in Baltimore County, Md.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The bill which I have offered contemplates this, that that extension shall be made.

It will require some rearrangement of the portico and of the columns; it will require two or more additional columns, and perhaps they should be larger. I think if any of you gentlemen will take the trouble to look, you will be impressed with the fact that the present central portico columns are not as dominant or as impressive as the columns of either one of the wings.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think it should be said, in answer to the statement made by the gentleman from Maryland, that the stone which was used in the main building came from Aquia Creek, Va.; that the stone which was used in these two wings came from Lee, Mass.; and that the stone used in the columns came from Maryland.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not desire to go into that. I have only 10 minutes, and if I should attempt to go into the details I could not possibly finish in the time allotted me.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think the gentleman from Colorado is wrong, and I notice he was prompted by another gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I know the gentleman is right in one respect, and that is that the sandstone used in the central building came from Aquia Creek, Va. With that extension you will acquire some 15 or more rooms that could be utilized to very great advantage.

The plan goes a step further. Take the steps which run down to Pennsylvania Avenue, which is the most dignified if it is the most arduous approach to the Capitol. Those steps are of black slate stone, and they reflect against a very noble background of white, which present a very inconsistent and unarchitectural design or device.

This stairway should be marbleized, and the whole main, dominant structure should also be marbleized. This treatment is entirely practicable. It could be done when I first offered my bill for less than $2,000,000. I do not know what it will cost now; at least, I have some idea, but I can not go into that phase of it now.

The dome is left for treatment. The dome, you may recall, is made of cast iron. Perhaps there is no cast-iron structure like it in the world, but with the new processes in the manufacture of steel, we have outgrown almost the knowledge of making cast iron. So it is doubtful if we could duplicate it when it may be necessary to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Lynn suggests this should be marbleized, but in the interest of economy this could wait a while.

What I desire to do, gentlemen, is this. Complete the Capitol upon the lines of my bill, which is substantially that of the commission, in the interests of the American people, so that we may have a structure that typifies in beauty, in dignity, and in majesty some of the grace, the culture, and the artistic aspirations of the American people so far as they relate to architecture. [Applause.]

I think a democracy is as much entitled to a great and beautiful structure architecturally as is a monarchy. I think our people are as much entitled as any other people or nation to all the benefits, artistic, intellectual, emotional, that arise in the contemplation of a mighty Capitol, and it is a pity, to me it is humiliating, that the Representatives of this great Nation should leave the first, and the oldest, and the dominant structure of this Capitol in its present incomplete and inharmonious form.

So I have risen, gentlemen, to bring this matter to your attention, hoping that some of you will take some initiative and press this project to a completion. We should do it for the sake of the people—for those living and who are to come. We should do it to match or surpass the great public buildings of the world. America should not lag behind in its greatest historic structure. We should complete the noble plan. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the very interesting statement made by the member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], about the ventilation of the House, brought forward a great many questions and a great deal of discussion.

I think it is appropriate at this time to bring to the attention of the House the exact situation with respect to this recommendation by the Committee on Appropriations. There have been a number of us here who are not on the Committee on Appropriations who have felt the need and necessity of a proper ventilation system in this Chamber. I have spoken on the matter on two separate occasions, once on January 31, 1927, and again on January 5, 1928. I have had numerous conferences with the splendid gentleman who is the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Lynn, for whom we all have the highest respect and admiration. We have been in constant communication about it, and at the last session of the Congress there was an estimate submitted to the Committee on Appropriations showing that this work could be done for $430,000, but when we ran across the chairman of the committee [Mr. MADDEN] he very promptly vetoed this because he said it was not in proper shape; that it did not give all the details. Then I again talked to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and between the two gentlemen, together with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and the splendid chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. MURPHY], as well as others on the committee, there has been evolved a scheme which carries out the unanimous desire and wish of the entire committee, and as a result of waiting a year we have reduced this estimate from $430,000 to $323,000.

I admit there may be merit, and there probably is merit, in the proposal to change this Chamber by taking out this wall and extending the auditorium to the outer wall, but there is considerable controversy over how the change should be made, some saying it should be cylindrical, and others suggesting different forms and designs for the auditorium.

This controversy has been going on in the House since the year 1853 and the membership of the House and the membership of the Senate have been dying, and according to the testimony of the Clerk of the House, as put into the hearings by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], we find that from 1893 to 1928 there have been 87 Senators and 203 Representatives who have died, and within the last three or four weeks, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, two United States Senators and a Member of the House have died.

We find in the other Chamber a distinguished physician, who in speaking about the death of a very distinguished Senator called the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that it was due in great measure to improper ventilation of these Chambers. I am speaking of Doctor COPELAND, a Senator from the great State of New York.

Gentlemen, of course I can appreciate the fact that some might want to wait to put in this system of ventilation, but how do we find this matter now presented to us? In the first place, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] required of Mr. Lynn, the architect, that he take the matter up with the superintendent of public health, Doctor Cumming. Doctor Cumming went to work and selected the greatest experts of the country, as follows:

Prof. C. E. A. Winslow, professor of public health of Yale University.
D. D. Kimball, consulting engineer, New York, N. Y.
F. I. Cooper, heating and ventilating engineer, Boston, Mass.
A. M. Feldman, consulting engineer, New York, N. Y.
R. E. Hall, engaged in ventilation of theaters, New York.

F. R. Still, vice president American Blower Co., New York.
A. C. Willard, professor of heating, ventilation, and head of department of mechanical engineering, University of Illinois.
L. R. Thompson, surgeon in charge, Public Health Service, Washington, D. C.
David Lynn, Architect of the Capitol.
Dr. R. R. Sayers, chief surgeon, Bureau of Mines.
Leonard Greenburg, sanitary engineer, Public Health Service.

These gentlemen have unanimously agreed on a system together with Doctor Cumming, and this system has the unqualified approval of the Architect of the Capitol. It has the unqualified approval of the entire Committee on Appropriations.

Are we now going to haggle on the question of a little money when the health of our membership, both in the Senate and the House, is dependent upon our action here?

And think about it, gentlemen! In the last few days thousands of visitors from all over the country have come here to see this beautiful Capitol and beautiful surroundings, and this is so every year, and are not they entitled to come into healthy and well-ventilated chambers? If a man sits on the floor of this House during the sessions, when he goes out in the afternoon in most instances he is suffering from a headache or feels listless and bad as a result of the poor ventilation. That is the situation. You talk about the membership; as I look in the faces of Members I see a number of people in the House whose health is not good at the present time. There is no use in calling any names. Why, gentlemen, this is a small amount we propose for proper ventilation of this Chamber. I am delighted at the way the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], Mr. SANDLIN, and others have met the situation. I want to commend them for it and thank them for it. I want to say that I hope the House will measure up to its duty and follow the splendid leadership of David Lynn, Doctor Cumming, and the Appropriations Committee in effecting this ventilation.

I want to see a change in the structure later on. I would like to have something to say about the change, but if you do not change the ventilation I shall probably not be here. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN.]

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the Mississippi Valley is the second largest valley in the world, only exceeded by that of the Amazon in South America. It is larger in area than the whole of Europe with the exception of Russia, Norway, and Sweden. The river discharges more than twenty-five times as much water as the River Rhine and three hundred and thirty-eight times as much as the River Thames.

If the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Arkansas, the Ohio, and the Red Rivers should reach their maximum flood crest simultaneously there would be emptied into the lower Mississippi 3,500,000 cubic feet of water every second.

On April 27 last year at Vicksburg the water reached the stage of 56 feet and up to March 4 it had reached 58.7 feet, which continued until May 9. During this 10 days' time the water flowing down the Mississippi River would cover 6,200 square miles for a depth of 10 feet.

The levee system was inherited from the French engineers 210 years ago. They were started as private projects to protect the city of New Orleans. When Louisiana was admitted into the Union the requirements of the Federal Government were that they should relinquish all claims—that the Mississippi River with all the waters entering into it should be reserved as a highway upon which the citizens of the State of Louisiana and the other several States should have equal rights.

The first record of a flood on the Mississippi was in 1543, and I can imagine the chagrin of the Spanish soldier marching away on Palm Sunday when the flood waters of the Mississippi reached them with the ferocity of a tiger and they must have thought of the days of Noah when the flood rose for 40 days and 40 nights.

Tradition tells us that in 1724 there was a great flood on the upper Mississippi, and this occurred again in 1740 and 1750. We have a record of eight floods on the upper river, seven of which occurred in the nineteenth century. There were nine great floods on the lower river during the nineteenth century. Eight great floods have occurred in less than 45 years.

It is worthy of notice that the Army engineers have had absolute control of the Mississippi River for 48 years, during which time these eight great floods have occurred and have increased, and although they spent $228,000,000 they complacently announce in their 1926 report that the flood-control work "is now in a condition to prevent the disastrous effects of the flood," and a few months later that statement proved to be bunk.

Now, although their plans proved a failure in practice we are asked to turn over this great problem, one of the most gigantic problems that has confronted the Nation, greater than the Panama Canal, to the same short-sighted crowd that ignores any suggestion from any other source or from civil engineers, and ask them to complete it. Congress dallied with the Panama Canal until that virile statesman and citizen, Theodore Roosevelt, kicked the red tape and bureaucracy into a cocked hat and got results. [Applause.]

The administration demands the Jadwin plan as the only solution. Why demand a plan already proven a failure? Why not obtain plans from the greatest engineers of the country? If they are in the Army, well and good; if from engineers in the departments, all right; if from engineers in civil life, then let us have them. When did General Jadwin become the only engineer that could deal with this problem? Congress has been offered no other plan, and Congress is not a board of engineers. I suppose the administration is acting upon the theory that Congress would not understand the different plans and other plans might not be in accord with the present financial policy of the President. Members stand on their feet here and talk about their colleagues getting together to pass pork-barrel legislation. When has Congress become so careless of the purse strings of the Treasury, or so unmindful of their duties to the American people, that they should be so characterized when they advocate a vote for the general good? Some people think that every dollar that is not spent in the city of Washington or for some pet project is pork.

The Mississippi River has a total length of 2,447 miles. It drains 31 States that comprise 41 per cent of the national domain, or 1,240,050 square miles. It carries an estimated cubic mile of rich alluvial soil down from the top surface of 13,000,000 acres of land in every flood, from the great central drainage basin of this country. Yet the Army engineers and their champions stand up and tell us that reservoir control of tributaries is not practical. As stated before, the levee system was inherited from the French engineers, who employed the system for local protection, but to-day we have the entire problem to deal with.

For 50 years the British engineers attempted to control the Rangoon River in Burma with the levee system, and failed for 50 years to control that stream. That stream has some similar characteristics to the Mississippi. It is a delta stream. Its flood waters come from tributaries rising in the adjacent mountain countries, and come down quickly, with great force and erosion. After the problem was turned over to the bureau of agriculture and forestry, the river control was so much improved that engineers from all over the world went there to make studies of the plan. Under the new régime levees were abandoned, and the river trained to make its own banks.

Outside of the question of reservoirs, who in this House can tell what magic can be worked by our own bureaus of forestry or soils or public roads? John Simpson, president of the Farmers Union of the State of Oklahoma, advances the opinion that the terracing of farmlands would reduce the floods in the Mississippi. The farmers do not expect the Government to pay for this, but to furnish plans and surveys. County agents at the present time are doing a great deal of work of this kind. The reforesting of denuded lands would not only check flood waters, but would become a great source of wealth. Reservoirs, properly located with a view to controlling the flood waters and later using these waters for the benefit of humanity either for growing food products or for power, would prove of great benefit to the country generally. The Government could not be expected to pay all of the costs. It could be determined what part would be reimbursable. When this was determined, then Congress could make the appropriations in accordance with the report. This method would greatly reduce the flood waters of the Mississippi, and turn a menace into a beneficent agency.

When engineers or anyone else tell me that reservoirs would not be effective to control the floods, they are talking in theories and not in facts. The thing Congress ought to do is to make an appropriation of sufficient funds to make immediate such repairs as are needed, and then appropriate a sufficient sum to employ civil engineers, together with all of the department engineers, to make a study of the water entering the Mississippi from the 31 States drained by this river, using all available data from the engineering departments of the several States and the colleges and universities, and then report back to Congress what plan ought to be adopted to control the waters of the Mississippi.

Here is the situation. We have had hearings for several months upon this matter. The Members of the House have not had the time or the opportunity to read these hearings. You do not know what is in them. I do not know what is in them.

We are then expected to get up and pass a flood control bill carrying three or four hundred million dollars, and nobody knows what will be the effect of it. Nobody knows what is in the hearings. The thing to do is to pass a bill with sufficient money to immediately repair the devastation down there as best we can, and make a study of this problem, which, in my judgment, is the greatest engineering problem that confronts the civilized world. [Applause.] They tell you that reservoirs will not control the water. You may just as well tell me that what goes up will not come down. You can go into these 31 States and by proper location of the reservoirs, with a survey made as to the utility of them for power and irrigation purposes in addition to flood control, you can then study the economical question.

The engineers tell us that the reason why flood control by reservoirs is not practicable is because it is not economical. On that point I want to call your attention to this fact, that the man who was assigned to draw up the report on the reservoir system in the Jadwin report was a man who had been in the employ of the Buffalo & Niagara & Eastern Power Co. He is stated to be one of the most outstanding engineers, but can he look at it from no other standpoint than as a power engineer? I can read to you the report where we are told you could not afford the reservoir system in the West because it was not ready for the use of power.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I want to compliment the gentleman from Oklahoma for making a very comprehensive statement on this proposition. I hope he will get Members of the House to agree with him and put it across.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. The gentleman should know what has been done in connection with the flood control in the Miami Valley, tributary to the Ohio.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes. It is a wonderful construction and of great benefit to that country, and if that system were to be followed you could go into Pennsylvania and West Virginia and Ohio and Indiana and Tennessee and many of the Western States and by conserving the flood waters you could hold them back a sufficient time so that you would not have the great amount of water that is going down the big streams.

They say that method will not solve the flood-control problem. Why not go into this matter carefully before we spend the money, and then we might find we had made another mistake? Why not look into it carefully, after you have made a failure of the system that has been in vogue for 50 years, the levee system, which has been tried also in China and Spain and Africa and has been found not to be the best system, for the reason that when the waters come down loaded with silt and rise out of their natural banks they come into contact with the artificial banks and stop the flow of water, and that causes them to deposit the silt in the bottom of the river. In 50 years you raise up the bottom of the river and raise up the levees, and here it goes on, and now you have the subsoil of that country where it will not stand very much more lifting by outside levees. You will imperil the lives of our citizens down there who have the right to expect protection from the National Government. We are called upon to deal with this question without adequate information. We are called upon here to deal with it now without knowing what to do. I insist that we should have engineering plans prepared by the greatest engineers that can be employed. It is true that we have some in the Army; let us employ them. Let us do this thing right. It is a tremendous problem.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield there?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is going to insist on an appropriation in this pending bill in order that the proper surveys will be made?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; but that is not all we ought to have in this bill. We should fix a plan by which we appropriate so many millions of dollars, but before we fix this plan altogether we may find that we can use the money to better advantage by holding these waters back on the tributaries, and if so, we ought to do it instead of putting it down here where it is going to be wasted.

Mr. HASTINGS. My colleague is going to insist with a great many others in having flood surveys made.

Mr. McKEOWN. We can not get anywhere unless we have a plan. I say to you that in the multitude of the business before you you have not had time and opportunity to study the details of these projects. You can not take this voluminous record and arrive at a satisfactory conclusion upon it. We ought to have an opportunity to study the problem. It is too big a proposition to be entered upon lightly. We should not enter upon a plan which later may be found out to be based on a wrong system. These engineers are not the people who are responsible. We are responsible for levying the taxes and appropriating the money.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman know as a matter of fact that in the case of the Arkansas River the Army engineers have condemned the idea of reservoirs, so that so far as their knowledge respecting the effect on the Mississippi is concerned the fact is they have never been outside of their offices in Washington to get the facts and figures necessary to support their position?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes. That is what I am complaining about. There is Colonel Kelly, an illustrious engineer; but Colonel Kelly while on leave of absence from the Government service was connected with the Niagara & Eastern Power Co., and he looked at this proposition from the standpoint of the power companies of this country and not as a question of water in the Mississippi.

Mr. SCHAFER. And since he made that report he has retired from the Government service and has gone completely into the employ of the power company in New York?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes. I am glad he has gone where he belongs.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Does not that illustrate the necessity of an independent commission to take this whole project out of the hands of the War Department, with its present influences in favor of the levee system as against the reservoir system? What hope will you have for the reservoir system with the Engineering Department of the Government pledged and prejudiced against it?

Mr. McKEOWN. I am trying to persuade Congress not to go ahead and appropriate all this money until we have had an opportunity to study all the plans and to exercise our judgment as to which is the most feasible, and in arriving at a decision we are entitled to the advice and judgment of the best engineers of the country.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield once more?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have heard the gentleman talk about this proposition entertainingly and instructively before. Is it not a fact that in estimating the cost of the storage plants they failed to take into consideration the possibility of amortization and the restoration of some of the money to the Government through the sale of water and power?

Mr. McKEOWN. That may be true, and it is possible that a great many of these reservoirs would not be economical from the standpoint of flood control alone, but when you consider the value of the power the amount of money which would be reimbursable to this Government would no doubt be quite large. We could sell these dams, in many instances, to power people and get our money back out of it.

But here is the proposition: When you raise the levees higher than the lowlands and you keep on dumping this silt into that river, thereby raising the bottom of the river and raising the crest of the flood.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman has spoken about what might come back from the sale of power. Will the gentleman also call attention to the fact that by holding these waters back and turning them into a lot of the streams it would result in having navigation on some of the inland rivers, which would mean very much cheaper freight rates to the farmers and producers of that part of the country.

Mr. McKEOWN. That is true. I was amused to read one plan that a civilian was trying to get before this committee. His plan was to take some high-pressure hydraulic machine and dredge out the Mississippi, and that might be worked if it did not cost too much. The engineers claimed many years ago that by building these levees up and retaining this river in a narrower channel it would scour out, but it does not do anything of the kind; it does the very opposite, and it simply deposits the silt in the bottom of the river. Some years ago I read that when Andrew Jackson was in New Orleans the river was just then about level with the streets he walked on and I understand that now down there in New Orleans the river has gotten up so high that they are beginning to think they are out in the mountain country when they get up in the morning and look up at the river.

If the levee system is the proper one and the engineers of this country agree it is the proper one and the only plan, of course, I will be glad to go along with it. But what I am complaining about is that Congress, without any information except what we get by hurriedly scanning these reports, is going to turn over this great sum of money without knowing what we are going to do with it.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Does the gentleman suppose anybody could get any real information by reading the hearings? Are not those hearings simply stump speeches delivered by interested politicians and also by interested property owners?

Mr. McKEOWN. I do not know about that. I could not read them all myself, and I admit I have not read them all. But I do say this, that the thing we ought to do is to give this question serious study, because it is a great problem. I would like to see somebody go out and study the reservoir question with an open mind; some engineers who have not formed an opinion heretofore against the reservoir system. I would like to see some man go down and look over the levee system who has an open mind, who does not think that is the only kind of a system in the world, and who has no prejudice against it.

I want to say this: The records show that what is the matter with us is that we always assume to know more than anybody else, and we are not willing to look to any other country to learn anything, notwithstanding the fact that they have been here longer than we have. We could send our engineers abroad to look into these rivers which they have learned to control. They controlled this Rangoon River without any levees at all in 7 years, while the road engineers for Great Britain for 50 years used the levee system and then gave it up. My prediction is that after you have spent your untold millions of dollars on what you call the lower Mississippi, with its banks falling in, that there will come along a greater flood than you have ever had before and destroy more property and more lives than have ever been destroyed. That is what has taken place in the last 45 years. The engineers have had it to deal with for 48 years, and yet the floods have increased; they have become more disastrous and have become greater, and the longer it goes the worse it gets. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, soon after becoming a Member of the House I heard in this Chamber a very graphic description of the Rules Committee by the able and eloquent gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. Speaking for the benefit of the new Members, among whom I was included, he said:

> I will say to my new friends here that if we sit here in this city until next summer, and the weather gets too hot for you, just go to the Rules Committee, and you will find icicles hanging from the chandeliers on the hottest day in summer.

About four weeks ago I experienced the frigidity of the atmosphere and the rigidity of the decision of this autocratic committee of the House.

A delegation composed of a majority of the Texas Members, with our colleague Mr. WILLIAMS as our chief spokesman, appeared before the Rules Committee to request that a rule be granted whereby the House would be permitted to vote upon the resolution offered by Mr. WILLIAMS to investigate the Federal reserve bank of the eleventh district, located at Dallas, Tex., a subject in which we were vitally interested, because it affects the banking, commercial business, and more especially the agricultural interests of our State.

We were accorded a hearing, but it was manifest from expressions of several members of the committee that its verdict would be unfavorable. And while, so far as I am informed, no official conclusion has ever been announced, the utter silence that has prevailed since that time indicates more eloquently than words that the resolution is destined to "sleep the sleep that knows no waking," and that this House will not be permitted to express itself thereon.

This action is to me a keen disappointment, for I believe the subject is one worthy of the consideration of this House, and I doubt not that if the facts were presented which prompted the introduction of the resolution, and the Members were permitted to vote upon it, that it would be adopted.

In a large legislative body like this, I realize that the orderly transaction of business requires a Rules Committee which shall determine the time and method for the consideration of legislation, but I deplore the assumption and abuse of power by that committee, whereby they consider, not the time or the manner in which the legislation shall be considered, but pass upon its merits, which is a substitution of their judgment for that of the House.

If this were a short session and sufficient time did not permit its consideration, the committee would be justified in declining to grant a rule; but such is not the case. This resolution could be considered and voted upon within a few hours' time. The House is well up with its work, and for that reason several Saturdays we have recessed, and on a number of days early adjournment has taken place, for the lack of business.

Two reasons were mentioned why the Rules Committee did not think the House should be permitted to consider the resolution. First, that the Senate had already appointed a committee to make such investigation, and secondly, they did not see what could be accomplished by an investigation.

I respectfully submit that these are questions affecting the substance and merit of the resolution, which the House should pass upon, and not its agent, the Rules Committee. The Rules Committee will have performed its duty when it determines the time and the manner in which the House shall consider the resolution. This committee was not created, either to chloroform or pass final judgment on the merits of any legislation, and when it does so, in my judgment, it is guilty of an abuse of power.

Unfortunately, under the existing rule there is no adequate remedy by which an appeal can be effected or a committee be punished for a dereliction of duty. I hope that some day the rules may be changed so that the membership of the House may be the master and not the slave of its committees.

Let me discuss briefly the two reasons assigned why the House is denied a vote upon this resolution. They are contradictory; one destroys the other. The fact that the Senate, by unanimous vote, ordered an investigation ought of itself to be sufficient evidence that there is enough merit in the resolution to at least justify its consideration by the House. If the Senate, composed of 96 Senators, thought that something might be accomplished by such an investigation, the Rules Committee of 12 ought not to arrogate to itself the authority of denying to the House the power of passing upon this question.

The investigation ordered by the Senate is not satisfactory to the people interested in this matter. It merely provides for an investigation by a Senate committee, while the Williams resolution would appoint a joint committee from both Houses to make such investigation. The Members of this House, who are the representatives of the people who are suffering from the wrongs committed by the governor of this Federal reserve bank, have the right to demand that if an investigation is to be had that a committee from this body shall participate therein. It would insure a more thorough and impartial investigation, and some doubts are entertained whether the committee chosen by the other body will either sympathetically or aggressively enter into the investigation.

We want the facts ascertained by a committee participated in by Members of this House, so that if any action is to be taken hereafter, or legislation is to be had as a result, that the House will have first-hand knowledge of existing conditions.

I realize that in some quarters there exists a prejudice against congressional investigations, and there are some who think that too many damaging facts have already been uncovered in other investigations. Some assert that Congress is to legislate, not investigate. Congress talks too much and investigates too frequently is the cry of some of its critics.

Against such a school of thought, let me quote the language of one who was well versed in our form of Government, who was a student of our political institutions, and a statesman whose name is interwoven with our history.

Woodrow Wilson, in his book entitled "Congressional Government," first published over 40 years ago, stresses the importance of this duty. Says Mr. Wilson in that publication:

> It is the proper duty of a representative body to look diligently into every affair of Government and to talk much about what it sees. It is meant to be the eyes and the voice and to embody the wisdom and will of its constituents. Unless Congress have and use every means of acquainting itself with the acts and the disposition of the administrative agents of the Government, the country must be helpless to learn how it is being served; and unless Congress both scrutinize these things and sift them by every form of discussion, the country must remain in embarrassing, crippling ignorance of the very affairs which it is most important that it should understand and direct. The informing function of Congress should be preferred even to its legislative function.

Those sentences were written by Mr. Wilson long before he entered the realm of politics; and while there may be a difference of opinion among some as to what place in history his achievements in statecraft entitle him to fill, I think it is the universal verdict of all that as a student of history, a writer on governmental problems, and an interpreter of our national institutions, that he deservedly took and will always hold very high rank.

There are those who would deny Congress the right to investigate, claiming that its duties are purely legislative and that the power to investigate is within the sole province of the courts. No court was ever organized that possessed the inquisitorial power of Congress. The jurisdiction of courts is circumscribed; they have no supervisory control or jurisdiction over the general affairs of the Nation. Courts investigate specific charges, while Congress, through its committees, can make a far more comprehensive investigation. Courts can only ascertain whether crime has been committed, while Congress by its investigations can nip in its incipiency practices that may ultimately lead to crime, or even if such investigations disclose no crime or the contemplation thereof, yet they may reveal inefficiency or dereliction in duty, which greatly impairs the efficiency of government. Congress, when it discovers a wrong or an abuse, unlike the courts, has the power by legislation to prevent or make more difficult its repetition. Congressional investigation will arouse the public conscience and crystallize public sentiment in a manner which courts can never hope to accomplish.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is there a Senate investigating committee investigating this matter at the present time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Such a committee has been appointed by the Senate, but if there has been any beginning made with respect to an investigation I have yet to hear of it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It is worse than no investigation at all. It is like submitting the Power Trust investigation to the Federal Trade Commission. It is in the hands of its friends. There will be nothing done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not heard of anything being done by the Senate committee.

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). Because it is in the hands of its friends, who, if they do anything, will perform the usual whitewash.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We do not want a whitewash. This is a matter of great importance and should be fully and fairly investigated by a joint committee of both Houses.

Mr. GARBER. Are the things the gentleman refers to crimes within the law or crimes without the law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. They are discriminations and gross abuses of discretion, permitted, as I understand, under existing law.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman thinks the policy should be under supervision and control by Congress instead of the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think the policy and the practices both ought to be investigated and if the law or the Treasury regulations permits such things to be done with impunity, then there should be legislation to prevent them in the future.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. When we limit the salaries of the Federal Reserve Board to $12,000 and then they pay $50,000 to some of their employees, are they not exceeding the authority that Congress gave them?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think the gentleman is right and I have heard a great deal of criticism on account of the very large salaries that have been fixed for the officers of some of these Federal reserve banks.

Congress constitutes the board of directors of the Federal Government. It makes the Nation's laws, but its duty does not end there. If it would legislate intelligently, it must have a comprehensive knowledge of conditions as they exist not only at the time of legislation but subsequent thereto. It must know the results of its legislation and how the people are affected by it, what wrongful practices are permitted thereunder, and especially of the abuses and wrongs committed by those who exercise power by virtue of the institutions and offices it creates, so that when necessary, remedial legislation may be enacted to protect the rights of the people.

The Federal reserve bank of the eleventh district at Dallas was created by act of Congress, and the governor and other officers of that bank exercise powers as the result of congressional decree.

The 820 banks in that district pay tribute to that Federal reserve bank, and deposit a certain per cent of their deposits therein, and furnish the capital stock of such reserve bank, not of their own volition but because under the laws of Congress they are compelled to do so. If these 820 banks and the millions of people which they serve are not being fairly treated, if they are being denied rights and privileges which the law confers upon them, if the agency which Congress created to serve them is not properly functioning, and instead of being a blessing is a curse, Congress ought to know it.

The preamble of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WILLIAMS] (H. Con. Res. 24) reads as follows:

> Whereas it is alleged that the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Tex., has violated the Federal reserve act by his refusal to recognize the rediscount privilege to member banks in rural communities; and
> Whereas it is alleged that the policies administered by the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Tex., in conducting the business of such bank, have worked many hardships on farming and livestock interests of the territory included in the eleventh Federal reserve district, etc.

Is that no concern of Congress? Are you going to create an agency and clothe it with power to require obedience to its officers, and then when it is charged that such agency is inflicting wrongs upon the people whom it is intended to serve, are you going to close your ears when they cry out to you for relief?

The eleventh Federal district comprises all of the State of Texas and portions of Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Louisiana. Approximately 7,000,000 people live within that district, and they are dependent upon their local banks to serve them, and these banks in turn must pay tribute to the Federal reserve bank, and also look to it, in a large measure, for the credit which they are to receive, and which they in turn extend to their customers.

Agriculture is the chief industry in the eleventh district. A majority of people therein are directly dependent upon agriculture for a living, and all other industries and people are indirectly dependent upon the fruits of agriculture. The Federal reserve bank therefore affects the welfare of every man, woman, and child, and when it does an injustice to agriculture it inflicts an injustice upon all.

The farming interests of that section, in common with agriculture everywhere, is having, and has had for the past seven years, a battle for existence, and the Federal reserve bank, which was created to serve this great industry, should be giving assistance instead of placing a strangle hold upon the banks to which the farmers must look for credit.

The author of this resolution [Mr. WILLIAMS] is known to the membership of this House as an able, conservative man of poise and good judgment. He never acts impulsively, and, in this instance, he spent much time in securing facts and knowing the ground whereon he stood before he offered this resolution. And no one who knows him would for a moment believe that he would have introduced such resolution until he believed that there were sufficient facts to justify it. He has permitted me to examine his file upon this question, and in addition thereto I have had conversation at various times with many bankers in my district, and I know from their statements to me, as well as the record in the possession of my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS], that there is abundant evidence to not only warrant but demand that an investigation should be made.

What would you think of the governor of a Federal reserve bank who would make this statement to one of the bankers in his district:

> Before I would be bothered with a little country bank like yours I would close it up within the next 30 minutes. We have too many of these now, and they are not essential to carrying on business in small towns. The farmers don't need any bank, but as long as there is one left they will apply for loans they are not entitled to and can easily get along without. We only need a few banks in the larger towns of Texas to take care of all the business. You should not loan money to farmers, but invest in Government securities and other commercial paper—calling attention to the progress of some eastern power company that was offering to discount some 90-day paper.

Or to another banker he stated:

> It was not intended for banks to advance money to make crops. That banks should only furnish money to move crops in the finished products.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that signed by Mr. Talley?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; those are excerpts from two letters which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WILLIAMS] has in his files written by two bankers who said Mr. Talley made such statements to them.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Does not the gentleman recall that about a generation ago we had an accumulation of grievances which resulted in the Pujo money-trust investigation, which indicated at that time there was a concentration of banking interests that endangered many institutions in the country? Is there not something significant in the statement the gentleman has just read to the same effect?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion, and I think his statement is well founded. The concentration of wealth has grown to an alarming extent under the present Republican administration, and the policy and practices of the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank is in harmony therewith. Possibly that is the reason the Rules Committee, which is controlled by the steering committee of this Republican administration, denies the House the right to vote upon this resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS has within his file these letters from which I have quoted, and also others of a similar character from bankers in the district, charging that such language was used by the governor of the Federal reserve bank at Dallas. I shall not quote their names because I am not authorized to do so.

Mr. J. C. Beck, president of the First National Bank of Frost, Tex., who lives in my district, and whom I have known for over 30 years as a man of very high integrity and ability, and who is a personal friend of Lynn P. Talley, the governor of the Federal reserve bank at Dallas, testified at a hearing held in Dallas that Mr. Talley told him that it was not the duty of the banks to see that the farmer was furnished money with which to make a crop.

Mr. A. B. Brown, president of the First National Bank of Lockney, Tex., at the same hearing, testified that Mr. Talley told him:

> That a country banker should not loan the farmer any money to make a crop loan, and his loans should be advanced after the crop had been gathered and put in a marketable condition. In other words, cotton after it had been picked and ginned and stored in a warehouse, then the warehouse receipts would be security, but his committee did not consider growing crops worth anything, and of course teams and tools were very poor collateral and should not be considered.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Does this resolution call for an investigation of the administration of the act for the district or for the entire system?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. For the district alone. We are not complaining at this time of the system as a whole. I think the Federal reserve system is a very fine thing if properly administered. Its existence has been of great value and I would not want to destroy it. I have no complaint about the system, but we want an investigation of this particular district, and of the abuses there perpetrated.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. But the same defects that exist in the district alluded to are likely to be found in all of them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Possibly so, though of this I am not advised.

Mr. BLANTON. And really there ought to be an enlarged resolution to take in an investigation of the defects in the whole system.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It might be well to so amend the resolution. Abuses of discretion and discrimination, whenever practiced, should not be tolerated. But let me resume the discussion of the Dallas district.

Mr. Whit George, president of the Farmers' National Bank of Italy, Tex., whom I know personally as a man of unquestioned integrity, testified at this same hearing to a fact concurred in by all bankers and others familiar with conditions in our section, that if the banks did not furnish the money to the farmers with which to raise a crop, that there would be no crop raised, and that only about 10 per cent of the farmers can ordinarily finance themselves to make a crop. He furthermore stated that there was an unfriendly attitude on the part of the bankers in his section, on account of the humiliating manner in which many of the bankers were treated by Mr. Talley, and cited one or two specific instances that had come to his knowledge.

Mr. Pat E. Hooks, president of the First National Bank of Itasca, Tex., and who has been connected with that bank for 25 years and is a leader in the financial and business world in Texas, and especially Hill County, which is within my district, and whose word is entitled to be given every credence, testified on this hearing that the sentiment of the bankers of Hill County toward Mr. Talley was unfriendly on account of his attitude and treatment of them. In a letter to me he stated that it was his belief that 75 per cent of the bankers were unfriendly toward the Federal reserve bank as conducted by Mr. Talley, though many of them would be afraid to express publicly their views.

In Navarro County, in which I live, the County Bankers' Association, at a meeting held in Corsicana on November 23, 1927, adopted the following resolution:

> Whereas it is apparent to us that the Federal reserve bank of the eleventh district, at Dallas, is not functioning for the benefit of the member banks and that a spirit of antipathy has arisen against the administration of the policies of the Federal reserve bank of said district; and
> Whereas it is further apparent that such condition is brought about by the reason of the application of such policies by Lynn P. Talley, the governor of said bank; and
>
> Whereas it is the sense of this meeting that the said Lynn P. Talley is temperamentally unfitted to act as governor of said Federal reserve bank, and that he is not in sympathy nor familiar with the difficulties of banks located in agricultural communities and has not had training or experience in the operation of banks located in agricultural districts; and
> Whereas the operation of the Federal reserve bank by the said Lynn P. Talley has destroyed the confidence of the smaller member banks to procure aid in time of a crisis, and that under the management of the said Federal reserve bank by the said Lynn P. Talley said bank is losing its usefulness and is destroying the good will of the member banks: Now therefore be it
>
> Resolved in this meeting assembled, That this association go on record as opposing the administration of the policies of the Federal reserve bank of the eleventh district by the said Lynn P. Talley; and be it further
>
> Resolved, That the said Lynn P. Talley should be removed as governor of said bank, and the full cooperation of the banks represented at this meeting is pledged to J. P. Williams, president of the First National Bank of Mineral Wells, Tex., who is leading the movement in his efforts to bring about such removal; and be it further
> Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to forward copies of these resolutions to Hon. C. C. Walsh, chairman of the board of said Federal reserve bank; W. W. Woodson, chairman of the advisory committee; and to the public press.

Mr. H. E. Chiles, president of the Itasca National Bank, of Itasca, Tex., a gentleman of the highest standing and who lives within my district, and has been connected with the same bank for 27 years, testified on the hearing already referred to, that the bankers in his section did not feel that the Federal reserve bank, as it is now conducted, was of any value to them. He further stated:

> They don't feel like Mr. Talley has much consideration for a country banker. He talked pretty brutal to them when they were under a strain, and he didn't encourage them.

He furthermore stated that some of the bankers were intimidated and felt that it would not be to their interest to make their complaints public.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Are the bankers who are complaining members of the Federal reserve system?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. They are.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WILLIAMS] himself a banker?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. He is a banker of long years' standing and a very successful one.

Mr. G. M. Mann, of the First National Bank of Whitney, Tex., also in my district, and whom I know and vouch for, testified on the hearing that Mr. Talley told him that the country bankers should quit loaning to farmers unless it was a good liquid loan, and told him to go back home and liquidate the loans, or close the bank. He further stated that he was so humiliated by the treatment of Mr. Talley, that he never returned to the Federal reserve bank in Dallas again for other accommodations.

There were a number of other witnesses who testified on this hearing to the same effect, and to other matters of a similar character, but I shall not quote from their testimony, contenting myself to only quote the testimony of those whom I know personally.

There is one other witness, however, to whose testimony I shall refer, and that is Mr. R. L. Harris, president of the City National Bank, of Blooming Grove, Tex., which is in my home county. I have known Mr. R. L. Harris all of his life. I knew his father, Mr. J. L. Harris, than whom no better man ever lived, and Bob Harris is a chip off of the old block, his word is his bond, and no one who knows him would doubt for a moment any statement which he might make.

In the hearing at Dallas he testified that he had been in the banking business at Blooming Grove for more than 25 years, and that in May, 1926, he went to the Federal reserve bank at Dallas to secure therefrom rediscounts, and detailed at length conversation which he had with Mr. Talley, which I shall not relate here, but at the conclusion of the interview he stated that Mr. Talley, in a very emphatic manner, told him that no further rediscount would be granted his bank, and he then said to Mr. Talley:

Do you mean to tell me that if it becomes necessary to extend us further rediscount privileges or close our bank, that we will have to close the bank?

To which question Mr. Talley replied:

Harris, that is just exactly what I mean. Go home and close your damned bank. It will be a damned good lesson for your community.

Bob Harris did not take his advice. Instead of closing his bank he went elsewhere and secured money at a higher rate of interest, and his bank is in a splendid condition, as is shown by the statement of his bank made on December 31, 1927, which is as follows:

Condensed statement of the condition of Citizens National Bank, of Blooming Grove, Tex., at the close of business December 31, 1927

J. R. GRIFFIN, Cashier.

It is fair to say that Mr. Talley and other employees of the bank denied having used the language attributed to him by Mr. Harris, but Bob Harris, under rigid cross-examination by counsel for the bank, did not flinch, and his testimony was corroborated by a lifelong friend of mine, Mr. A. G. Elliott, president of the Corsicana National Bank, of Corsicana, Tex., to whom Mr. Harris talked on the same day after he had the interview with Mr. Talley, and he told Mr. Elliott and also Mr. Fortson, of the Corsicana National Bank, and other parties of the very language that was used to him only a few hours before. On cross-examination, when counsel for the bank was trying to break the effect of Mr. Elliott's testimony, he said that, knowing Bob Harris as he did and his splendid integrity, he would believe implicitly what he did say, whether Mr. Talley denied it or not. Mr. Elliott has also known Mr. Talley for many years, but, knowing both men, he believed Harris.

Mr. J. C. Beck and others testifying to the reputation of Mr. Harris stated that he was a credit to any community, and I want to say that I give unqualified indorsement to all that has been said concerning the reputation of Bob Harris for truth and veracity.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What is there about the farming class that they should be banned and be denied financial assistance which every other class is granted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Federal reserve system was created for the benefit of the farming class as well as other classes and the Federal reserve district in which we live and which this bank has been established to serve; the largest part of the business in the district is composed of those engaged in farming, and if the Federal reserve system does not serve them, then there is an absolute failure upon its part to perform the duties which Congress intended it should perform.

Mr. BLANTON. Because farmers are entitled to financial assistance the same as every other class in the country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. They certainly are, and if the Federal reserve bank at Dallas, as now conducted, denies the rediscount privilege to the bankers of Texas, and thereby prevents them from securing funds at a low rate of interest, so that they can serve their customers, and forces the bankers to go to the large city banks for credit and pay a much higher rate of interest, then the banks are to that extent restricted and crippled in extending credit to the farmers.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. And the records will show that the Federal reserve bank at Dallas, Tex., in June of last year with over $70,000,000 capital stock, and deposits had $3,800,000 rediscounts to member banks secured by securities other than Government securities, or approximately 5 per cent of its capital and deposits. On the same day the Federal reserve bank had over 50 per cent of its capital stock and deposits invested in open-market securities and Government securities.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank my colleague for that statement, which is corroborative evidence from the bank's own record that these bankers are telling the truth when they say that the governor of the Federal reserve bank at Dallas has been withholding from them the rediscount privilege. It shows that the policy of the bank under its present administration is to invest ten times more in Government and other securities than in the amount of rediscount privileges, or loans, extended to member banks. It should be remembered also that in June the banks in the cotton section reach the peak of the credit extended to farmers, and naturally their demand for rediscount privileges if granted by the Federal reserve bank would be reflected by a large and not a small amount in such securities.

It is interesting in this particular to compare the record of the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank with the one in the sixth district, located at Atlanta, Ga. The resources of the two banks are not greatly different and both serve agricultural districts where cotton is the chief crop.

From the Federal Reserve Bulletin of December, 1927, issued by the Federal Reserve Board, at Washington, on page 836, I have secured the following figures showing the discounts and deposits of these two banks for the first 11 months in 1927:

Discounts and deposits of two Federal reserve banks

1927	Discounts		Deposits
	Atlanta	Dallas	Atlanta	Dallas
January	$34,435,000	$5,606,000	$72,723,000	$62,156,000
February	26,738,000	3,215,000	72,531,000	63,763,000
March	31,389,000	3,197,000	71,134,000	63,170,000
April	34,140,000	4,403,000	72,766,000	62,587,000
May	34,625,000	4,670,000	71,126,000	61,645,000
June	32,618,000	6,172,000	68,810,000	59,765,000
July	36,273,000	7,374,000	68,471,000	60,209,000
August	34,671,000	12,742,000	67,482,000	59,759,000
September	31,085,000	10,981,000	68,848,000	63,044,000
October	25,999,000	7,151,000	70,827,000	66,429,000
November	32,695,000	8,388,000	70,412,000	69,165,000
Average monthly	32,242,000	6,718,000	70,466,000	62,880,000

It will be observed that the average monthly deposits of the Atlanta bank exceed those of the Dallas bank slightly in excess of 11 per cent, while the average monthly discounts of the Atlanta bank exceed those of the Dallas bank nearly 500 per cent.

My colleague [Mr. BLACK of Texas] has secured the figures showing a comparison of these two banks from their statements of July 29, 1927, and which he used before the Rules Committee, from which I quote:

The Dallas bank, of its earning assets, had in bills bought in the open market, in round numbers, $9,000,000. That means commercial paper, such as Armour's, Swift's, or the paper of other large concerns. They had in bills discounted which were secured by Government securities, $2,200,000. Anybody can borrow money on Government bonds, either from a correspondent bank or from the Federal reserve bank. The Dallas bank had invested in Government securities $27,933,000. Of their earning assets at that time $39,216,000 were invested in the manner I have just indicated. Of ordinary bills discounted for member banks not secured by Government securities, they had $6,530,000. At that date, the Atlanta bank had of its bills bought in the open market, in round numbers, $10,000,000; of bills secured by Government securities they had $4,834,000, and they owned of United States Government securities $10,383,000, or a total of $25,266,000. Their ordinary bills rediscounted for member banks not secured by Government securities amounted to $31,000,000, as compared with $6,530,000 of such bills discounted by the Dallas bank.

Stripped of its technical terms so that the average layman will grasp its significance the Atlanta bank on that date had loaned to member banks in its district on the notes of the customers of these banks about $31,000,000, while on the same date the Dallas bank had loaned to the banks in its district on the notes of their customers only about $6,500,000. The Atlanta bank had been five times more liberal in extending credit to the banks in its district than the Dallas bank had been to the banks in the Dallas district.

The statement of the position of those criticizing the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank is so well expressed in a letter which I received recently from a banker in my district that without mentioning his name I desire to read you his letter. The writer thereof I have known for over 20 years. He is a safe, conservative, and successful banker. He is a man of sound judgment, free from prejudice or passion, and his words always carry conviction with those who know him:

FEBRUARY 21, 1928.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: I am taking the liberty to write to you to solicit your interest and earnest consideration of the question that has so thoroughly aroused the country bankers of this Federal reserve district; that is, the removal of the present governor, Mr. Lynn Talley. You are thoroughly aware of the distressed condition of the farmers of the country for the past few years and their urgent need of all the assistance that can be safely given them by the banks of the country and all Government agencies that have been organized for their aid and relief.

The interests of the farmers are so thoroughly interwoven with that of the country banker that whatever affects them affects us and whatever affects us vitally affects them. The country bankers are very anxious to render all the assistance they can to the farmers, who have been so badly in the dumps for the past few years, but deposits in country banks the country over are very low, and their ability to aid is very limited unless they are able to rediscount during the summer months.

The arbitrary methods of the present governor and his utter lack of interest in the problems and welfare of the farmer and country banker make it almost impossible for them to get rediscounts with this bank. In fact, rather than suffer the embarrassment and humiliation of continued refusals, many of us have ceased to have any business with the Federal reserve bank except to keep up our reserve with them as required by law, and have gone back to the old method of borrowing from commercial banks at a high rate of interest and keeping with them compensating balances all through the year. Some have taken the other alternative of confining their loans to such amount as they will be able to take care of with their own resources throughout the year. I do not have any complaint at the Federal reserve system. In fact, I think we are all agreed that its organization was one of the greatest pieces of legislation of the age.

But having to tie up our limited means in its stock and keep our reserve with them without interest and then be deprived of the only privilege they have to offer us, that of rediscount, is a pretty bitter pill. The average country banks are paying their officers and employees very meager salaries and about one out of five for the past few years have been paying any dividends to their stockholders. Yet we are paying this gentleman $25,000 a year (about five times the amount he could command from any commercial bank) for this magnificent service he is rendering us.

It is no small wonder that two or three hundred country bankers have raised such a roar, and this number does not by any means represent the dissatisfied bankers of the district.

A great number of them say, "I feel just as you and the others do about it, but the power of the governor of the Federal reserve bank to withhold or extend credit is such that I can not afford to incur his displeasure." Any consideration you may give this matter will be appreciated not only by me but by hundreds of other country bankers of this district.

Yours very truly, ——— ———.

The complaint and criticism of the Dallas bank comes largely from what is termed the "country banker"—that is, banks of capital of $100,000 or less, located in the smaller cities and towns, and whose loans are largely made directly to the farmer. Naturally, the bulk of the paper which they have for rediscount is of that type to which Mr. Talley is opposed, and the credit to which they are entitled is not extended them, and they are compelled to go to the large city banks and pay a higher rate of interest. The large city banks profit by this policy, since the volume of their loans is larger, and therefore, the administration of the Federal reserve bank is not objectionable to them. The Federal reserve act was designed to serve all, and not the few, and if, in its administration, such is not the result, there is something wrong, either with the law or its administration.

As to the charge of temperamental unfitness of the present governor of the Federal reserve bank at Dallas, permit me to say that while I do not know Mr. Talley personally, I understand he is a man of ability and integrity, but from the statements of bankers made to me, it appears that he is autocratic in his dealings with many of the bankers in that district.

I abhor tyranny. As a Member of this House I voted to impeach a Federal judge who used the power of his office in tyrannical conduct toward others. The House impeached him, and before the Senate could try him, he resigned. One reason why the people cling so tenaciously to the doctrine of State rights is because too often Federal officeholders become arrogant and intolerant. Some of the field income-tax officials who are sent to deal with citizens, it has been reported to me, are not only discourteous, but at times insulting. The American people will not tolerate, oppression from their officials, whether they are elected or appointed, or whether of high or low estate. For one, I am always glad to use the power of Congress in investigating officials of this type, and in taking such steps as may be necessary to protect the people therefrom.

There are some bankers who feel that the criticism of Mr. Talley and his administration of the Federal reserve bank at Dallas is unjust and undeserved. Two bankers in my district, of high standing, have so expressed themselves to me, and there are perhaps others in my district who entertain the same view. The criticism, however, is so widespread and comes from such reliable and conservative sources that it provokes an issue which requires determination by a disinterested and impartial investigation. Indeed, Mr. Talley and the friends of the bank should desire such an investigation, so that if the charge of abuse and discrimination is unfounded his administration and policies would be vindicated.

The officers and directors of the Federal reserve bank at Dallas and the individual bankers of the district are aligned upon one side or the other of the issue, and it would be exceedingly difficult for a board created by them to render a decision that would be either satisfactory or acceptable to the parties at interest. A congressional investigation would furnish a forum where all these matters could be sifted, the truth ascertained, and a just conclusion announced.

It was suggested to me that a discussion of this subject or an investigation by Congress might cause the people to lose faith in the Federal reserve system. I do not share such views. If the Federal reserve bank at Dallas, or any other district, is not properly functioning, it is the duty of Congress to ascertain such fact and, if so, whether it is a defect in the law or the administration, and then correct it by remedial legislation or otherwise.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] one minute.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the McNary-Haugen bill has already passed the Senate and is coming up here soon and propaganda has already been started, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a very interesting letter written by the president of the New York Mercantile Exchange in regard to it; and I would lay special stress on the eighth reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, under consent this day given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert herewith a letter written by Mr. Charles F. Droste, president of the New York Mercantile Exchange, to its members, urging them to write their Members of Congress and Senators to vote against the McNary-Haugen farm bill. I invite the careful attention of the Members of Congress from agricultural districts to the reasons he gives why this bill should not pass, and especially to the eighth reason.

The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK MERCANTILE EXCHANGE.

To members:

Referring to our bulletin of April 7, concerning the McNary-Haugen bill, it is important that individual members write letters of protest to their representatives in the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington, D. C.

The bulletin referred to contained the names of Senators and Members of the House. Some of our members seem to be puzzled as to just what sort of a letter of protest they should write. It is suggested that you can draft a letter taking some of the ideas expressed in the following short paragraphs and enlarge upon them in your own language. It is not at all necessary to take all the ideas expressed, but pick out one or two as your subject matter.

First. Objection to the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill because it must finally result in putting the Government in business.

Second. The Government in business in competition with its citizens is manifestly unjust.

Third. Taxation of one group for the benefit of another is unjust.

Fourth. The whole plan is un-American in principle in that it subsidizes one group of citizens at the cost of another.

Fifth. Elimination of competition is unwise in any line of business.

Sixth. The administration of cooperative affairs will probably finally fall to Government instructed agents, such agents having been educated at the expense of all the people.

Seventh. Equalization plan that gives foreigners America's raw materials at less cost than to the American converter is manifestly unjust and unfair.

Eighth. Tinkering with the tariff for the benefit of one group as contrasted with another group of citizens will lead to needless controversy and is manifestly unfair.

As it is quite likely the McNary-Haugen bill will soon be voted upon, you are urged to write at once to your Washington representative.

NEW YORK MERCANTILE EXCHANGE.
CHARLES F. DROSTE, President.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have asked for time this afternoon to bring to the attention of the House a matter which I think deserves the consideration of this body.

The Inland Waterways Corporation is a Government corporation, organized by act of Congress under date of June 3, 1924. This corporation, as you are perhaps aware, is by law under the direct control and supervision of the Secretary of War, with Maj. Gen. T. Q. Ashburn, of the United States Army, as chairman of its board and executive head.

The Inland Waterways Corporation was created for the purpose of carrying on the operations of the Government-owned inland, canal, and coastwise waterways system. I am informed that these operations have been in a large measure very successful, in which event, if true, it has my commendation. But, gentlemen, regardless of the corporation's efficiency and success, it has been recently, in my opinion, grossly derelict in its duty with regard to the award of a contract for the construction of a towboat to be used in its service and manifestly unfair in the award of a contract for the construction for such vessel, and it is to this incident that I desire to address myself at this time.

Last December the Inland Waterways Corporation invited bids from several shipbuilding concerns over the country for the construction of the towboat in question. The Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co. of Charleston, S. C., was one of the concerns receiving an invitation to bid, and this good concern, which I have the honor to represent as a Member of this body, proceeded to prepare its bid in compliance with the specifications and plans along with six other concerns. These bids, of course, from all concerns were competitive, and it may be said at the outset of my remarks that every concern was to stand, of course, on its bid. The bids were in due course received and opened at the office of the Inland Waterways Corporation on January 23, 1928, and the result of each bid was as follows:

Marietta Manufacturing Co	$233,745.00
The Dravo Construction Co	227,800.00
Howard Ship Yard & Dock Co	214,743.00
The Spear Engineers (Inc.)	207,000.00
Dubuque Boat & Boiler Co	196,000.00
The Charles Ward Engineering Works	192,760.00
Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co	175,877.65

It may be said here that each company making a bid had a representative present at the time the bids were opened, with the exception of the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co. Thus every concern had an opportunity to look over, study, and observe its competitors' figures. You will, of course, observe from the bids as submitted that my people, the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co., were the lowest bidders by a wide margin, being $18,000 lower than the next bidder, the Charles Ward Engineering Works.

Now, what can you imagine happened? The representative of the Charles Ward Engineering Works, the next lowest bidder, then and there in the presence of the representatives of the other bidders, with the exception, of course, of the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co., who, as I have stated, had no representative present, had the nerve to raise the question of certain alleged indefinite features found in the specifications, or the interpretation of certain clauses therein. Of course no objection was heard from any of the representatives of the other bidders present, because it may be assumed that all the other bidders being higher were already out of court, and their only chance therefore for the job was to be given the privilege of either revising their bids or that all bids be thrown out and new bids submitted. The representative of the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Co. also requested to revise their bids. I quote here a part of letter, under date of January 24, from the Inland Waterways Corporation to the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co., which reads as follows:

When the aforementioned determination was made all representatives of bidders had left our office, except the representative of the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Co., who stated, when he had seen our determination, that his company would like to revise their bid in connection with our determination, and that he thought that any other bidders who were in line for consideration for the work would desire to do likewise.

This company, you will observe, assumed therefore to speak for the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co., without any semblance of authority from them whatever.

The Inland Waterways Corporation, strange to say, without further ado, permitted a revision of the bids from all parties. I contend that this action on their part was unwarranted and indefensible, especially so when the lowest original bidder, the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co., was not even present, consulted, or considered. I maintain, to the contrary, that if the Inland Waterways Corporation officials in charge of this matter wanted to be fair and square with these bidders, they should have instantly thrown out all bids and required entirely new bids to be submitted. It may be said, of course, that the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co. did receive notice of the corporation's decision to permit a revision of the bids, but being the original low bidder and having construed the specifications correctly decided to let its bid stand as originally estimated, and not once did it ever believe that the other bidders would be permitted the privilege of revising entirely their bids under such circumstances.

The supplemental bids were required to be on file in the corporation's office on or before January 30. And what do we find on this occasion? The Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co., the lowest original bidder, did not change the amount of its bid in the slightest, with the exception of an offer to deliver the boat at Mobile for the additional price of $2,000 under its own power or $4,000 if towed.

Mr. Chairman I have a number of letters relative to this matter and ask permission to incorporate them in my remarks and also permission to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request from the gentleman of South Carolina? There was no objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The following letter from the Inland Waterways Corporation to the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co., under date of January 24, and reply from the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co. to the Inland Waterways Corporation, under date of January 26, reads as follows:

(Governed by the Secretary of War. Maj. Gen. T. Q. Ashburn, United States Army, chairman of the board, executive)

INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1928.

CHARLESTON DRY DOCK & MACHINE CO.,
Charleston, S. C.

GENTLEMEN: Bids were opened in this office on yesterday for the construction of a towboat for our use on the Warrior River in accordance with plans and specifications furnished you. The bidders were as follows:

Marietta Manufacturing Co	$233,745.00
The Dravo Contracting Co	227,800.00
Howard Ship Yard & Dock Co	214,743.00
The Spear Engineers (Inc.)	207,000.00
Dubuque Boat & Boiler Co	196,000.00
The Charles Ward Engineering Works	192,760.00
Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co	175,877.65

All of the bidders stipulated for 240 days as time for completion except the Charles Ward Engineering Works, who stipulated for 270 days.

In connection with its bid the Charles Ward Engineering Works called attention to certain indefinite features found in the specifications. When an analysis of the bids was attempted it was found to be advisable to determine as nearly as possible at this time these features which the specifications left somewhat indefinite and submit this determination to the bidders.

To this end you are now informed, with reference to the following listed items in the specifications that the following remarks in connection with them are now made with the intention on our part that the bidders consider these remarks as if they had been originally embodied in the specifications:

1. Generators: The specifications call for two 50-kilowatt alternating-current generators, either turbine or reciprocating, engine driven. The following will be accepted: Engberg 50-kilowatt direct-current generator. (This should mean reduction in cost of $400 per generating unit.)

2. Main engines: Nordberg.

3. Main boilers: Babcock & Wilcox, as per the specifications and proposition they made to bidders.

4. Boiler feed pumps: Worthington, 10 by 6 by 12.

5. Fans: Forced draft fans are not included but will be considered as a part of the fuel-burning equipment that is to be furnished by the owner.

6. Fire, bilge, and sanitary pumps: Worthington, 8 by 5 by 12.

7. Fresh-water pump: Worthington, 1½ U horizontal centrifugal pump.

8. Condensing equipment: Worthington, with their 1,542 square feet condenser and their 1,400 gallons per minute circulating pump; their steam air ejector and their hot-well pump as specified in the proposal furnished bidders, excepting the condenser is to have a plate-steel shell instead of the standard cast-iron shell as shown in their specifications.

Also note that the centrifugal pumps will be driven by direct-current motors in place of alternating-current motors.

9. Capstans: Will be of the type described in the attached specifications as applies to the side and stern capstans, the forward capstan to be of the Iowa Machine Works type or equal, which figures at $2,200, f. o. b. Clinton, Iowa.

10. Radiators: Iron radiators are acceptable.

11. Boats (paragraph 53 of specifications): In lieu of the specifications read as follows:

Two boats, one with scow bow and one with model bow, of sufficient dimensions to accommodate 24 men. Boats to be located, one on port and one on starboard side. Both boats to be equipped in accordance with the standard regulations. The sides of these boats to be of cypress and the bottom, scags, ribs, etc., of white oak. Three boat chaulks per boat made of oak and secured to deck to be installed. (NOTE.—This change in specifications eliminates outboard motor.)

12. Anchors (paragraph 71): Builder is relieved from furnishing anchor; same will be supplied by owner.

13. Galley (paragraph 73 of specifications): The owner agrees that the range to be selected by it will not exceed a cost of $300.

14. Searchlight (paragraph 28 of the machinery specifications): 1,000-watt light made by Carlisle & Winch Co. will be satisfactory unless owner is able to inform contractor of source of supply of more satisfactory light of no greater cost.

15. Transformer (paragraph 30, machinery specifications).

With direct current as provided for above, transformer need not be installed.

16. Wiring (paragraph 31 machinery specifications): All transformers are eliminated.

17. Test (par. 36, machinery specifications): Paragraph 4 of machinery specifications provides for certain equipment to be installed at owner's cost. The owner will protect the contractor against any expense directly pertaining to such testing and/or preparing of such equipment as may be found to be necessary preliminary to the test mentioned in paragraph 36 of the machinery specifications.

When the aforementioned determination was made all representatives of bidders had left our office except the representative of the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Co., who stated, when he had seen our determination, that his company would like to revise their bid in connection with our determination, and that he thought that any other bidders who were in line for consideration for the work would desire to do likewise. For this reason this letter is written to you, in order that you may, if you desire, revise your bid in line with this letter, and let us have your revision on or before Monday, January 30. Upon receipt of this revision from all of the bidders, or, at any rate, on the date last above named, we will proceed to further analyze the bids and determine whether or not the contract is to be let under any of the bids.

In connection with this revision of your bid, you are informed that you may state, as a separate item and in addition to the amount of your bid, a bid covering the cost of your guaranteed delivery of the boat contemplated to any point on the Mississippi or Warrior Rivers now reached by the tows of the Inland Waterways Corporation. This should be stated in such form as to permit incorporating in the contract of construction that may be drawn a provision that delivery is to be made by you at such point on the Mississippi or Warrior Rivers as is designated by you in such terms as will cast upon you and your bondsmen responsibility to make good any defects in the boat appearing within 12 months from the date of delivery, to have been caused, either directly or approximately, by strains or injury sustained on the trip from your plant to the point of delivery.

In connection with such a bid it is desired that you state the guaranteed number of days required by you, in addition to the days allowed for construction, to accomplish the delivery. Such a bid is not definitely required, but if received from you it would facilitate our analysis of the bids.

Please let us hear from you in these regards as quickly as possible.

Very truly yours,

T. Q. ASHBURN,
Major General, United States Army, Chairman and Executive.
By CLARK C. WREN,
Assistant to the Chairman.

JANUARY 26, 1928.

INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION,
1016 Munitions Building, Washington, D. C.
Attention of Maj. Gen. T. Q. Ashburn.

GENTLEMEN: Replying to your inquiry of the 24th in regard to bid submitted for towboat, we would like to answer this in form of your inquiry:

Item 1. Generators: We estimated on Westinghouse generators and did not figure on Engberg.

Item 2. Main engines: We estimated on these as specified.

Item 3. Main boilers: Babcock & Wilcox, as specified.

Item 4. Boiler feed pumps: Worthington, as specified.

Item 5. Fans: We figured as specified.

Item 6. Fire, bilge, and sanitary pumps: Worthington, as specified.

Item 7. Fresh-water pumps: Worthington, as specified.

Item 8. Condensing equipment: We figured on Worthington 1,542 square feet, condenser and their 1,400 gallons per minute circulating pump; their steam air injector, their hot-well pump as specified in the proposal furnished bidders; but we did not figure on a plate-steel shell. We figured on cast-iron shell as steel-plate shell was not mentioned in specifications.

Centrifugal pump: We will make it direct, as specified.

Item 9. Capstans: We could not get quotation on Clay, and as specifications were marked "or equal," we figured on using the American Engineering Co.'s capstans, which heretofore have always proven satisfactory.

Item 10. Radiators: Correct.

Item 11. Boats: We figured on item 11 as specified.

Item 12. Anchors: As specified.

Item 13. Galley: We figured on a Shipmate range, which covered the specifications.

Item 14. Searchlight: As specified.

Item 15. Transformer: As specified.

Item 16. Wiring: As specified.

Item 17. Test: Your specifications were understood by ourselves and we made bid in accordance with these specifications.

In regard to delivering this boat, we delivered for the United States Engineers one towboat and one snagboat; one being delivered to Apalachicola and one to Mobile. The latter now runs on the Warrior River, we understand. We will agree to deliver this boat to Mobile, which we understand is the entrance to the Warrior River. The maximum price will not exceed $2,000. We believe it can be delivered a little cheaper, but we are giving you a maximum price. We believe it will have to be delivered with a crew of at least 20 men, as she will run continuously outside from Charleston to Mobile. This also pays for the railroad expense and return of the crew to Charleston. If it is delivered this way, we would have to ask that you furnish necessary bedding and equipment so as to take care of the crew. We understand this equipment would have to be furnished anyhow.

On account of the short duration of time to get this information, the insurance generally amounts to 1½ per cent for full marine risk. You did not ask for this last item, but we are giving you this information. If we had time to secure quotations, we might get this delivered from three-fourths to 1 per cent, as at times we have gotten insurance as cheap as this.

When we made this bid on the towboat, we made it with the full understanding in our opinion that we would give you a first-class towboat, properly built under your specifications and drawings. We ask that you get in touch with the United States Engineer Department, which will tell you whether we are reliable or not. We have just completed within the last three years four boats for them, two of which were delivered in the Gulf.

In regard to the steam capstan, if you prefer these built by the W. A. Riddell Co., of Bucyrus, Ohio, we will be very much pleased to substitute these in place of the ones of the American Engineering Co.

It will take six days to make trip from Charleston to Mobile, weather permitting; or we will agree to send boat in tow of our ocean-going tug, the cost of which will be $4,000. We feel confident from the advice of our towboat captain that there will be absolutely no danger in sending this vessel under her own steam. Of course, you realize that you will have to add insurance. We will be very glad to get this insurance for you if the above information is of interest.

Very truly yours,

CHARLESTON DRY DOCK & MACHINE CO.,
C. V. BOYKIN, General Manager.

But the Ward Engineering Works and the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Co. submitted revised figures that were identical. Each bid $182,000 against the Charleston concern of $175,877.65, the Ward people reducing by $9,000 and the Dubuque people reducing $14,000, but both as you clearly see still $6,000 higher than the Charleston concern.

It can be successfully stated here, without fear of contradiction, that the items opened to interpretation of the specifications as raised by the representative of the Ward Engineering Works at the time the original bids were opened on January 23 could not have affected the two original bids of the Ward and Dubuque concerns to the extent of $9,000 and $14,000, respectively.

The Charleston concern, as is shown in their letter to the Inland Waterways Corporation under date of January 26, offered to deliver the boat at Mobile for a maximum price of $2,000 under its own steam or $4,000 if towed. But in spite of this offer, and still several thousand dollars less, including the cost of either method of transportation, the Charleston concern was no longer considered as eligible bidders by the Inland Waterways Corporation, it being alleged by the corporation that their engineers had advised them that it would not be safe to take the boat for the trip by sea, although invited to submit a bid at a cost to them of $400 or $500. What strange and expert advice this, at so late a date! Why was not such advice forthcoming from these experts long before the bids were asked for?

My people as a result of this very strange, ridiculous, and absurd advice on the part of the engineers were then kicked out in the cold and the race of professional bargaining permitted to continue between the Ward Engineering Works and the Dubuque Co., with identical bids of $182,000 each. These two survivors were then permitted to run another race, with the result, according to General Ashburn, that the Ward bid dropped to $170,900, who finally landed the contract. What a proceeding! The Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co., the original lowest bidder, kicked out on the pretense regarding the safe delivery of the boat to Mobile, and the Ward concern, awarded the contract by a series of successive bargainings permitted at the expense and unfair methods accorded the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co.

This entire matter has created much comment and speculation throughout marine circles of this country. I desire at this time to have the clerk read an editorial appearing in the Marine News, one of our leading marine publications, in its April issue, covering this case. It is headed "Bargaining rather than competitive bidding." It covers this transaction fully, and very properly states that bids handled in this manner lose all the value which attaches to the competitive-bidding system, and the system becomes one of bargaining rather than bidding.

The Clerk read as follows:

BARGAINING RATHER THAN COMPETITIVE BIDDING

The preparation of plans and specifications for the building of an ocean liner is, as a rule, an involved undertaking, and the naval architect requesting bids from prospective builders can not be too careful in wording the specifications so that they may be easily and readily understood by all concerned, thus assuring positive and fair competition. It would appear that this same principle would apply in the drafting of specifications and plans for smaller craft, but in certain instances such has not been the case. The resulting confusion has led to misunderstandings and revisions of bids, resulting in awards which, on the face of them, have appeared unfair to the original low bidders. When the contract has been signed, the initial low bidder has been left standing, so to speak, out in the cold, while another who has had the advantage of studying the other fellow's figures walks off with the prize.

An example of such a condition is found in the recent taking of bids by the Inland Waterways Corporation, owned by the United States, for the construction of a twin-screw towboat for inland river service. The plans and specifications were prepared by War Department engineers who should be, by reason of their past experience, thoroughly capable of such an undertaking.

In response, bids were submitted by seven reputable shipyards, most of which had already figured in the building of similar craft. After the bids had been opened in the presence of a number of the bidders' representatives, the question was raised by a certain representative as to the interpretation of certain clauses in the specifications. Whether this was due to a lack of comprehension on the part of the bidder or to a possible lack of clarity in the specifications we can not say, but are inclined toward the latter belief.

At any rate, all bidders were subsequently communicated with, the letter of the Inland Waterways Corporation specifically interpreting the sections of the specifications believed to be subject to misunderstanding. The original low bidder, who had in practically every instance construed the specifications correctly, elected to let his bid stand, never believing that other bidders would be extended the privilege of revising their bids under these circumstances.

However, the opportunity to do so was afforded the other bidders, with the result that one of these shipyards reduced the figure some $9,000, while another cut the figure by $14,000, bringing their prices exactly even, but still some $6,000 higher than that of the original low bidder. It is quite safe to here point out that the alteration of figures relative to the items open to interpretation would not have affected these two original bids to the extent of $9,000 and $14,000, respectively, but having the added knowledge of the original low bidder's figures, these other yards possessed a decided advantage. In addition to the cost of construction, it was known that the award would depend to a certain extent upon the cost to the Inland Waterways Corporation of delivering the boat to Mobile, Ala., from which point it was to operate.

It must here be pointed out that the plant of the original low bidder is situated in a South Atlantic port, and when the amended bids were analyzed the War Department engineers decided that the boat was not designed for a trip in the open sea and it would be dangerous to attempt to make it, notwithstanding the fact that this same shipyard has comparatively recently built and delivered two boats for the War Department, delivering them in this manner in each case.

The original low bidder offered to deliver the boat at Mobile for a maximum price of $2,000 if operated under its own power or a maximum of $4,000 if towed, but it was decided that the prices offered by the other bidders would be less than the probable cost of construction and delivery if the contract was awarded to the South Atlantic builder.

Under these circumstances, the offer of the original low bidder was not further considered, and negotiations with the tied bidders resulted in a further revised bid from one of these which was approximately $4,000 less than the price of the original low bidder, and the contract awarded accordingly.

There are many points here which, to say the least, are open to criticism, all a result of loosely drawn specifications which resulted in misunderstandings. Specifications should be so worded as to make further explanations or interpretations unnecessary. Clauses or sections of specifications should be questioned by bidders before submitting tenders—not after bids are opened and all concerned have had the privilege of examining competitive figures. If questions arise which cast any serious doubt upon the proceedings, all bids should be rejected, new specifications should be issued, and entirely new bids asked.

And, most important, yards not considered capable of performing the work by reason of geographical location should not be encouraged to submit bids only to have them rejected by reason of some later discovery. The preparation of an estimate for vessel construction costs a shipyard considerable money, and the practice of accepting bids which, later, for some reason or another can not be considered, results in demoralization in the industry and consequent loss of faith in the good intentions of the concern or individual requesting bids.

Bids handled in this manner lose all the value which attaches to the competitive bidding system, and the system becomes one of bargaining rather than bidding.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. Has the gentleman a bill carrying out his intentions here to have some investigation made of this matter?

Mr. McMILLAN. I have no bill. I am simply calling this matter to the attention of the House. It is a condition that has arisen, that is not right, unwarranted, indefensible, and the door closed against the lowest original bidder.

Mr. HERSEY. Does the gentleman intend to follow this up by proposed legislation?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes; by a formal resolution asking for an investigation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is a governmental agency?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes. And in this case competitive bids were asked for, and the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co. invited and were the lowest bidder by $18,000.

Mr. BLANTON. And it is still keeping up its batting average at 1,000 by still being the lowest bidder?

Mr. McMILLAN. Absolutely; until they were fired by the manager and put on the bench and two substitutes permitted to run a race in their place to see which would finally land the job.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is not my purpose to longer detain the House on this matter. I will, however, insert a few communications I have received from my people expressing to me their views, feelings, and disappointments at the consideration they have received. I am frank to say that I have gone very thoroughly into this case, and I am convinced beyond a question of doubt that the Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co. has been given a raw deal. Such transactions as this practiced and carried on by responsible officials of this Government do not invite confidence and good will on the part of our people. It should be remembered by public officials of whatever station that their actions are always observed, and in no event should they permit anything to be done that will reflect upon their sense of fairness and to maintain at all times that principle of "special privileges to none and equal opportunities to all."

The Hon. THOMAS S. MCMILLAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In December we received an invitation from the Inland Waterways Corporation, Maj. Gen. T. Q. Ashburn, chairman of the board. This bid was opened around January 21, and we were notified that we were low bidders by the bonding company. On January 24 we received letter from the Inland Waterways Corporation, a copy of which we are inclosing. You will note that we were considerably lower than the others. You will also note that the bid stipulated 240 days and the boat was to be delivered to the Government at Charleston. Consequently, we being so much lower we did not think there was any difficulty about our securing the contract. This morning, through a confidential source, I received information that our bid was to be thrown out and the next bid awarded the job.

Could you kindly call on these people and ask them what would be the prospects of our getting this work? Then we will leave to your discretion the answer in case they say that same has been awarded. It strikes me that the Government should not put contractors to the expense of making estimates and furnishing plans and then, when they are low bidders, throw them out.

Last summer we bid on a ferryboat for United States quartermaster to run at Governors Island, N. Y. This boat was under the command of General Cheteman. We were also low bidders on this boat. It ended up by our losing this also.

It looks like we people in the South have two privileges: Paying taxes and fighting. Please look into this and let us hear from you.

Of course, you readily understand the moment we start influence and they are forced to give us work, they can put such objectionable inspectors here that we could not possibly come out on the right side of the ledger.

Awaiting your reply, we remain,

Yours very truly,

CHARLESTON DRY DOCK & MACHINE CO.,
C. V. BOYKIN, General Manager.

Hon. THOMAS S. MCMILLAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Many thanks for your letter in regard to the Government contract. For your information I am sending you copy of the Marine News. If the Inland Waterways Corporation had rejected all bids and called for new bids we would not have felt so badly in regard to this contract, but to deliberately throw out the low bidder and award same to the next bidder, with a difference of $18,000, we can not understand.

We understand that Ward made a statement that we could not deliver this boat. For your information we have built one for Wilmington, N. C., and delivered same, and two for the Mobile district and delivered these also. In fact, these three boats were of much weaker construction than this one.

In regard to time, the Government themselves set the time at 240 days.

There is evidently some serious leakage in this department, and we would appreciate it if you will get behind them all you can.

Very truly yours,

C. V. BOYKIN,
General Manager Charleston Dry Dock & Machine Co.

Hon. THOMAS S. MCMILLAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We thank you very much for the trouble you have been put to in regard to the Inland Waterways Corporation's boat.

General Ashburn's reply certainly is a poor one. If you will look at the inquiry which they sent us after the bids were opened you will see yourself that not once did they ask us in that to revise our bid. They simply stated that some of the bidders did not understand some of the questions in the Government proposal and you will see in our reply that we told them we would be willing to furnish a boat absolutely to their specifications. Not once did they ask us to revise our bid. In another part you will see that we told them that we had delivered four boats of weaker construction to the United States Government, two of which were delivered from here to Mobile, and the Government has been using them for the past two years; and in our contract for this boat is contained a clause that if it showed any structural weakness for the first year we would have to make same good. For the life of me, we can not understand why they asked us to bid, knowing at the time about transportation. It costs us about four to five hundred dollars to get up these estimates.

Thanking you once again for your interest, we remain,

Very truly yours,

CHARLESTON DRY DOCK & MACHINE CO.,

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, the idea of Federal aid to highway construction is by no means a new one. It was in the minds of Washington, Jefferson, and the other founders of this Republic.

Our Government embarked upon the plan of Federal aid to help the States build their highways in 1917. I am very proud of the fact that I had something to do with the adoption of the original Federal aid act. I introduced a bill several years since which was considered with others, introduced on the subject of Federal aid to highways, and resulted in the best features of all being merged into what later was known as the Shackleford Act. Congressman Shackleford was chairman of the committee, and the bill bore his name, and properly so.

How well the work has progressed since the Federal Government joined in it with the several States is a matter of common knowledge. There are now highways and roads where there were formerly none and where there perhaps never would have been any if the Federal Government had not helped. It has meant great progress in many material ways. It was constructive and worth-while legislation. Some of the States were building on their road programs, but it was an expensive undertaking on the part of the States, and it was progressing so slowly it would have taken many years to have done what has been accomplished in 10 years' time through Federal aid. No money appropriated or expended by the Government so greatly benefits the masses of the people as that spent on the highways, for it helps everybody.

The help from the National Government takes half the burden from the shoulders of the counties and States, and to that extent is an enormous saving to the counties and States. But for Federal aid the counties and States would be very heavily taxed to build their roads.

The total amount apportioned for all the country from 1917 to 1927, inclusive, for Federal-aid projects is $671,357,000. Of this Georgia has received $18,431,953. For this the people of Georgia are grateful. It is enabling that great State of almost unlimited resources to more rapidly build her roads than she could have otherwise done, which in turn will materially help in the development of our wonderful resources that are almost as yet untouched.

Just how these Federal-aid funds have been apportioned to the several States will be of interest, so I am going to read into the RECORD a list that has been compiled by the Bureau of Public Roads, which is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF PUBLIC ROADS.

Apportionment of Federal aid to States fiscal years 1917–1927

Alabama	$14,349,455

Hawaii	1,100,153
Total	671,375,000

It is my privilege to be a member of the great Committee on Roads in the House, which has to do with the authorizations for this Federal aid, and I have taken a deep interest in the work of this committee. It appeals to me because it is constructive, beneficial, and useful work. While great progress has been made in highway construction in the short time Congress has been making these appropriations, it is not progressing as rapidly as it could or as it would if the work were speeded up by greater help from the National Government. Ten years of Federal aid convinces us that it has been and is worth while, but it also convinces us if we are to have a national system of improved highways in our lifetime we must double our energies, fix a definite program, and carry the work to completion, not alone for future generations but for our own use in the present generation.

Several highway associations, through their respective representatives, all claiming to be the "father" of the Federal-aid idea, appeared before our committee and were heard, leaving a mass of information, most of which we already had. Nearly all of these so-called highway associations made themselves ridiculous in that they came with formal resolutions declaring in favor of Federal aid and that the amount should not be less than $75,000,000 per annum, as if anyone opposed Federal aid and as if anyone ever expected any less than $75,000,000 per annum. The result is they are going to get only the $75,000,000, and why? Because they did not ask for more. If they had come in here asking for a larger expenditure in this important work they could no doubt have convinced the President, the Department of Agriculture, the Director of Public Roads, and the committee that more Federal funds could be used each year on Federal-aid highways, and instead of a $75,000,000 bill, which we will likely pass, those associations could have strengthened the hands of those of us standing for larger appropriations for this work, that means so much to all the people, and we would no doubt have gotten out a bill carrying $100,000,000. But these associations all seemed to be content for the work to go on at the extremely slow rate it is going. They failed to show that progressive spirit that such associations ought to have. Then there is a quiet, hidden, and mysterious influence, quite strong and effective, carrying a constant threat that highway appropriations are doomed unless the tax on automobiles is restored. This is all a bluff. The administration would not dare defeat the roads bill, nor would the President dare to veto it. This road work is too close to the hearts of the American people. The tax should come off the automobiles and likely will if the few patriotic Republicans who voted with the Democrats stand by their convictions and continue to stand by the people.

The Committee on Roads—at least, a majority of the committee—has reported to the House a bill carrying only $75,000,000. Messrs. ALMON, HUDSPETH, GARDNER, CANNON, and I have filed a minority report favoring $100,000,000 per year for two years. In this way the work would be speeded up and the States, already willing and anxious to match these funds, would get their highways completed and the people would get full benefit and enjoyment now instead of waiting eternally on the slow progress being made.

In certain quarters it is argued that certain States of great wealth, like New York, Pennsylvania, and a few others, pay nearly all the income, inheritance, import, and other taxes, and that the States like Georgia, South Carolina, and other States where there is not so much wealth get their proportion of the Federal funds. These big, wealthy States ought to remember that they have grown rich out of the tributes paid to them by Georgia and the other States that are not so wealthy and that it is just and right that these funds go to the common good of building highways in all the States for the use of all the people, and these more wealthy States ought to be glad to contribute to this great and important work.

The question of the auto tax ought not be considered in connection with this or any other governmental expenditure. Certainly it is in no sense linked with the road question, as some try to argue. Rome built roads and no auto was then contemplated. There was no auto tax in this country when this Government passed its first Federal aid act in 1917. It is just propaganda to which no attention should be paid and is unworthy of those using the threat to defeat road legislation if we insist on tax reductions.

If we build for the peace and happiness of our people we will act wisely. The amount we are spending for roads each year is not a drop in the bucket to what we are spending in the aggregate on the Army, Navy, and for other governmental purposes. We should build our highways, improve the waterways, and do other things that make for the material internal development of our country. It all helps in the development of commerce and adds to the comfort and happiness of the people. Ours is now approximately a "four and one-half billion dollars Government" in its annual expenditures. It is startling to think that 82 per cent of all the money spent by our Government is for past and future wars; that is, in paying pensions, bonuses, and other war obligations that have come to us as the result of past wars and in keeping up an adequate Army and Navy, required for our national defense in the future.

I am quoting from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury recently sent to Congress, in which he says:

> When the average citizen grumbles over the size of his income-tax payment he often visualizes his hard-earned money being spent by the Government to compile reports on business or agricultural conditions, or to erect public buildings, send diplomats abroad, carry on scientific investigations, or make and enforce laws. As a matter of fact, a small part of the taxpayer's dollar goes into work of this sort, only about one-sixth being used for all the multitudinous types of ordinary civil functions added together. One-half of each tax dollar is used for the service of the public debt. * * * The remaining one-third of the taxpayer's dollar is spent on military expenditures for national defense or payments to military veterans.
> * * * In modern times the Federal tax burden of one generation is largely determined by the military activities of the preceding one. In the fiscal year 1927 expenditures for interest on the public debt exceeded by over $140,000,000 the aggregate amount of ordinary civil expenditures and exceeded the amount of all retirements of the public debt by nearly $70,000,000.

These figures are illuminating and speak volumes. If we spend more on internal improvements that make for the material welfare and permanent good of our country, perhaps there would be less to be "grabbed off" for big armies and navies.

Citizens of all States use the public highways. They are open to all, and the whole country should pay for the highways. I realize that it falls heavier upon the more wealthy States than on the less wealthy ones, but if we are to have a system of roads that will connect up the various States so that traffic can move uninterrupted over good highways, the States that are able to do it should pay for it and relieve the poorer States of the burden, for, after all, the highways are for the use of all.

I will not attempt to give the miles of road in all the States effected by Federal aid, but I do want to give some data as to Georgia. The Federal aid highway system in Georgia includes 5,558 miles, of which 2,369 miles have been improved with Federal aid. This has cost over $36,000,000, one-half has been paid by the National Government. What a saving to Georgia and to Georgia taxpayers!

This is the greatest and richest nation on earth. The interest on the money other nations owe us would more than pay our annual expenditures on roads and erect all the public buildings we need if we could just collect it. Instead of dallying around canceling the debts France and other nations owe us, we ought to insist upon the payment to us of these debts of honor due by other nations and quit talking "poor mouth" when it comes to spending something on our highways. We ought to see how fast instead of how slow we can do the job, and we ought to enter quickly upon a definite program of building highways out of concrete and other permanent materials with the view of giving the people of this country a completed system of highways in the next few years. Work of this kind will live as a perpetual monument to the men who make it possible. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there was sent to this House to-day, and it is now on the Speaker's table, the only farm-relief measure that this session of Congress will ever see. We ought to take it off of the Speaker's table and pass it here this evening. Another body, knowing that the President of the United States in the last Congress vetoed just such a measure, has sent it back to us again for consideration. That body knows that if such a bill becomes a law it must override another presidential veto.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment I will yield gladly. Our Committee on Agriculture is not proposing to submit to this House at this session any other measure, and it is a simple question of the buck having been passed to us and letting the farmer continue to hold the bag.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to the ablest and most distinguished parliamentarian this House of Representatives has ever had.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman think it is significant that the Senate in passing this buck to the House, passed it by 4 votes more than the two-thirds necessary to override such a veto if it should come?

Mr. BLANTON. I am afraid that is not quite the case, I will state to my good friend from Missouri. The bill passed by 53 votes, and 53 votes are not two-thirds of 96.

Mr. CANNON. But the gentleman will recall that there were sufficient men paired to make it a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not remember that, if that is the case. My remembrance is there were 6 other votes paired in favor of it. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, is it precisely the same bill that the President vetoed before?

Mr. BLANTON. It contains the same economic principles to which he launched his objections and which caused the veto. It is the old controversy and the old conflict of interest which has forever in the past and which forever in the future will continue to exist between the millions of consumers in the great cities like New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, and St. Louis, and the conflicting interests of the rural population who produce what city people eat and wear. It is the interest of the consumers in the city against the producers in the country. If you could solve that problem, then you could get relief for the farmer.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not exactly the consumers the gentleman means. He means those in the city who control these farm products.

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I can not yield further. I heard a former distinguished colleague of the gentleman from New York, the late Bourke Cockran, say from this floor that he was going to speak frankly; that he was going to tell the truth. He said he represented 5,000,000 consumers in New York City who wanted everything the farmer raised, everything they ate and wore, as cheaply as they could get it.

He was not in favor of raising prices for the producers. There is the situation that we must face, and I have reached this conclusion: That however much I have opposed some of the uneconomic provisions of this so-called McNary-Haugen bill, since it is the farmer who is being kicked around here like a football in Congress, I am going to do just as I did last year on the question—I am going to vote for it when it comes up as the only chance on earth for the farmers of this country to get any relief. [Applause.] I am going to vote for every single measure that is brought up before this Congress until we adjourn that has any promise whatever of relief for the agriculturists of this land. They are the only ones who work with their hands who have not been granted a living wage. They are the only ones—6,500,000 heads of families in this country—who are not getting a living wage, and some of their families are suffering for the necessities of life. I am going to vote for every single measure that is brought here that promises them any relief whatever.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I regret I can not yield further in my limited time.

Now, I want to speak about another subject. When I first came to this Congress here in the District of Columbia there was what was termed the 50–50 system. The people of the United States back in Wisconsin, in Maine, in Texas, in California, and the rest of the 48 States, paid one-half of all the civic expenses for every person who lived in this Nation's Capital. They paid half the cost of these million-dollar bridges here; the million-dollar bridge up on Connecticut Avenue, for instance. They paid half the cost of these fine school buildings here, some of which cost several million dollars, like the Eastern High School, like the Central High School, like the Western High School, like the Business and the Tech; many of them being splendid buildings here. They paid half the cost of all the salaries of the 2,500 school-teachers here, half the cost of all the free school books, and the playgrounds. They paid half the cost of the lighting system here, and of the sewer system, of the street-cleaning system, of the ash-gathering system, of the trash-gathering system, of the tree planting, of the tennis courts, and municipal golf links, and all the amusement parks. They paid half the cost of all the municipal buildings here for the people. They paid half the cost of the hospitals and the municipal courts of this big city. They paid half of everything, and the tax rate at that time, based upon the existing 50 per cent valuation, was only 90 cents on $100.

A few of us here began to fight that iniquitous, infamous system on behalf of the people of the United States, and we made ourselves very unpopular with the press of Washington. The press of Washington did not like us to get up and fight their system which made the Nation's Capital the mecca and the haven for the tax dodgers of the United States.

I remember I gathered statistics on this question. I got the tax rate from every mayor of every city of importance in the United States, and I printed those statistics in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I spent my good money out of my pocket to have a reprint made in the Government Printing Office, and I got the addresses of prominent citizens in the 48 States of the Union and scattered those statistics from one end of the United States to the other, and other Members here began to help us to fight on it, and we finally abolished that.

Then we got what is called the 60–40 system. That was the first step toward doing justice to the taxpayers of the United States. In other words, our taxpayers at home paid all their own local taxes and all their own civic expenses, and then they paid 40 per cent of all the civic expenses of the people here in Washington. We abolished that 60–40 system. Our friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] got an amendment passed to make the contribution of this Government only $9,000,000; $9,000,000 to be paid each year out of the Federal Treasury toward the civic expenses of Washington, besides several other million we annually give the people here.

These local newspapers ever since then have organized the biggest lobby here I have ever seen in my life. They have filled their editorial columns, the Evening Star, especially, trying to get back to the 60–40 plan first and they hope for the 50–50 plan later. They have filled our desks and mail boxes with their propaganda. The other body has just voted that iniquitous 60–40 system back into the District of Columbia appropriation bill that we sent over to them. That bill is back before this House now, and it will be called up here out of conference in a few days, and I hope the membership of this House will prepare itself to meet the issue like men and do unto it what should be done in behalf of the people of the United States, namely, kill it by such a decided vote that it will never be brought up again on this floor.

Do you know what it will mean to your taxpayers back home if you vote to sustain that Senate amendment? It will mean an extra $10,000,000 that is to be taken out of your tax-payers' pockets and paid on account of the civic expenses of the favored few who have the privilege of living in the Nation's Capital. What are you going to do about it? Are you going to just let it come up here and vote it in, with hardly any consideration? Are you going to let just a few of us get up here and fight against it, and then proceed to vote it in? Are you men who are interested in the people back home going to be here on this floor prepared to meet it and kill it by your vote?

Mr. McKEOWN. We have always voted that down in the past.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, we have; but another body continually tries to put it back again, and sometimes we get careless and sometimes we go to sleep, as it were, at the switch.

In the dying days of Congress, when our minds are filled with politics and when we are thinking about the hustings back home, when we are not engaged so much upon what is going on in this Chamber as we are concerning that which goes on in our various districts, we get a little careless. When the bell rings we do not come over always, and when a yea-and-nay vote is on we sometimes pair ourselves when even the man with whom we are marked paired does not know what the vote is on.

Mr. SANDLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SANDLIN. The gentleman does not think it would interfere with our duties here to think about the hustings at home, does he?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it does with mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. SANDLIN. The gentleman seems to be very active in his duties here.

Mr. BLANTON. I am trying to do my duty here legislatively, and I have five men and two women opposing me on the hustings in Texas. But as soon as we get through with our work here I will look after them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentlewoman from Kentucky [Mrs. LANGLEY].

Mrs. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, Kentucky is justly proud of the thrilling victory of the Ashland Tom Cats in the recent national basketball tournament held in Chicago, and it was my privilege to ride in the fire truck with the Ashland team in the splendid celebration given them by their home city Easter Sunday morning, when an estimated crowd of 10,000 lined the streets to welcome the triumphant victors. [Applause.]

My colleague from Kentucky, Mr. VINSON, who has the honor to represent the Ashland district, graciously gave in detail on Monday last the magnificent part played by the Carr Creek boys in the victory won by Ashland and the glorious way in which they carried Kentucky's banner almost to the goal, thus aiding the Tom Cats to win. [Applause.]

I feel that I have an equal honor in representing a district which can and has produced such splendid specimens of boyhood. These boys had every difficulty to surmount and yet—game mountaineers that they were—they played their gallant part.

The Carr Creek school was organized by our own mountain men and women. The team trained in the open without even a gymnasium, with funds raised by the Woman's Club, the business and professional clubs of Hazard, and the citizens of my section, went to Chicago and matched their skill against the best trained teams in this country.

St. Louis has its Lindbergh; the Yankees their Babe Ruth; Ashland has its Tom Cats; last, but not least, the tenth district has its mountain lions, the game little fighters of Carr Creek. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a complete history, written by Earl Ruby, of the Carr Creek team and school, now famous.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend her remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The history referred to follows:

From in and beyond the mountains of eastern Kentucky come Kentucky's champions, the teams which will carry the State's banners to the national scholastic basket-ball tournament at the University of Chicago the week of April 1. Louisville, Lexington, Georgetown, and other cities of the plains and bluegrass, which until the eliminations started were selected as the most probable bearers of the flag, sit back, vanquished, as Carr Creek, from Knott County, in the heart of the mountains of southeastern Kentucky, and Ashland from the northeast and beyond the mountain chain carry on.

The team representing Carr Creek won the class B championship in the Kentucky State tournament at Lexington last week and all but licked the Ashland Tom Cats in the finals for the title of the State. This week the squadron is preparing to invade Chicago in quest of the national scholastic crown.

When it was announced two weeks ago that a school by the name of Carr Creek had conquered Stuart Robinson, 35 to 18, for the Class B championship in the twenty-eighth district net tourney at Hazard, the majority of fans throughout the State thought it was a typographical error, that there was no such school in Kentucky. Then, when the same team went on to Richmond and annihilated Mount Vernon, the favorite, 25 to 16, for the B title and then lambasted Middlesboro, 26 to 15, for the championship of the region, folks sat up and rubbed their eyes and took a second look. The team not only had walked away with the tournament, but with the heart of the city as well. The worn and frayed uniforms of the players were replaced with brand new ones in which the boys might play in the State meet.

Then, at Lexington!

Walton, class B titlist of the sixth regional, was drawn as first opponent. Odds were about even, with no one certain of the outcome of the battle but Carr Creek. The team and its rooters never once thought of defeat. Carr Creek won, 31 to 11, without a substitution or time out.

Minerva, conqueror of Corydon in the first round, was next. Odds were against Carr Creek, and for more than a half it appeared the "wisenheimers" were right, but in the third and fourth quarters, the mountain boys came back strong to win, 21 to 11, without a substitution or time out.

This brought the squadron to the finals in class B, a position no one in the State but Carr Creek followers believed possible for the boys to attain, even after seeing them play in the first round.

Lawrenceburg City High, famed and applauded for its notable triumph over Kavanaugh High in the seventh district meet at Lawrenceburg, when Kavanaugh was touted as one of the prime favorites to win the Kentucky crown, defeated Woodburn, 38 to 21, to gain the other finals berth.

The teams met Saturday afternoon, March 17, the winner to play the class A winner for the championship. Lawrenceburg was favored by all, but when asked the night before the game how he honestly believed his team would come out in the fracas Coach Oscar Morgan said, "Oh, we'll win over Lawrenceburg all right, but I believe Ashland will give us some trouble later in the day." He was right, but no one thought so at the time. Not even Brother Constant, coach of St. Xavier, who put the question to him.

But the words of the coach were borne out, and with a vengeance. At the end of the first quarter Carr Creek was ahead, 10 to 2. The team won, 37 to 11.

Much has been told of the eventful final contest which was won by Ashland, 13 to 11, after four extra periods of battling. In passing, however, it might be said that even in the last extra session, when Carr Creek's boys were losing, they were playing just as clean, just as hard, and just as fast basketball as in the opening quarter, and the players on the bench, the coach, and other officials of the school sat with broad smiles on their faces, happy, apparently, in the fact that their boys were playing the game to the last second, and playing as they had been taught, whether winning or losing. They welcomed the warriors to their breasts after the killing conflict, with tears in their eyes, but they were tears of joy and pride.

The squadron left almost immediately for home, but almost as quickly was routed out by friends with the news that the boys had been invited to the national tournament at Chicago. With hardly enough funds on hand to run the school, the community center folks were not much taken with the idea at first, but when it was impressed on them that funds would be raised, it was agreed that the boys should be given their one chance to see some of the outside world and to have the chance to try their skill against the best teams in the United States.

The Carr Creek lads will arrive at Lexington Tuesday for a week's practice on the University of Kentucky floor in preparation for their trip to the national tournament at Chicago. They will be quartered at the Y. M. C. A. free of charge, according to Effie King, secretary of the "Y."

John Mauer, head basketball coach of the university, said he would offer his services to the mountain lads to help polish them up for their big test, although there is not much left for any coach to do with these boys, with the exception of showing them a few pointers in crib and foul shooting.

According to Mauer, Carr Creek has an excellent offense and one of the most perfect defenses he ever has been. The uncanny ability of the Carr Creek boys in guarding, in which an enemy player immediately is picked up by another member of the team after he dodges the first line of defense, is rarely seen among high-school players, according to Kentucky's coach, and is a system which would take years to instill into a college team.

Carr Creek and Lexington Senior High School will stage an exhibition game at 8 o'clock Thursday night at the University of Kentucky gymnasium here. All the proceeds will be turned over to the team from the hills. There also is a fund being raised by friends of the Creek men, which, added to the profit from the exhibition game, will be used to build a gymnasium for the boys, who do most of their practicing out of doors because of the lack of a suitable floor.

Miss Margaret P. Humes, Jersey Shore, Pa., is in charge of the school. She donates her services and in addition has contributed more than $7,000 in cash toward the improvement of the center. She is assisted in the running of the school by Martha A. Beecher, superintendent of the high school, and five trustees, citizens of the community.

Carr Creek is not a town in the ordinary sense of the word, nor is Dirk, the closest post office. Both are parts of a community. Marion Francis, a trustee of Car Creek Center, is postmaster of Dirk, and his office is in his home, "up the hollow," from the point in the road which is marked by a sign painted on a board nailed to a log by the road inscribed "Dirk."

The settlement is composed of eight buildings—the schoolhouse, teachers' cottage, office, girls' dormitory, boys' dormitory partly completed, a community house, girls' cottage, and a barn. The holdings, including the 43 acres of land, part of which was donated, and the buildings, represent an outlay of approximately $15,000, with about $3,000 in equipment.

This year children are forced to attend the school from across the mountain, 2 miles up and 2 down, or 10 around. Since last year, however, donations have been received which have enabled the people of the section to erect a small school at Flax Patch on the other side of the range. It will be open next fall.

The five trustees, chosen from and by members of the community, are S. N. Stacy, Marion Francis, Simeon Johnson, W. C. Francis, and R. L. Collins. Miss Humes and W. T. Francis are the executives.

The Center was organized seven years ago by the community of Carr Creek for the purpose of educating the mountain children. Five trustees were elected from the members of the community and two executives brought in to supervise the school. Circulars were distributed all over the United States asking for donations. This has been done every year. The Center was incorporated in 1924, and indorsed by the Daughters of the American Revolution in 1920 and the Daughters of 1812 in 1927.

The money first received was used to buy building material, and the citizens of the community built the houses required. Eight buildings have been erected.

All students except those who come only for day classes work for their board and none who are able to pay are accepted. All boys and girls, however, rich or poor, who live within the district, attend the day classes, as the county helps pay the teachers that the children in the district may attend, thus eliminating the necessity of a county school.

There are 10 on the faculty at present, and 142 children in school. Fifty are in the high-school division, and 26 are boys. The teachers get about one-half the normal salary of teachers throughout the State.

The institution is unique in that it is the only one in the State which was organized by men in a community who saw their own need and set about to remedy it. There are 200 children in the section on the school's waiting list, but there is no room for them.

The school wishes to start a drive for material enough to build a gymnasium. If the money is obtained, the people in and around the community will erect the building. W. T. Francis, one of the executives, says he could not build a gymnasium with money contributed in the regular way for the school's work, as another building would mean more for the community as a whole than a gym, but he realizes the people who now would give toward a gymnasium would not ordinarily give for the other wants of the school, and that as the students are anxious for the basketball court he will be glad to receive all donations.

It is requested that all donations for the project be sent direct to the Center, Dirk, Ky., rather than to the paper. J. H. Bowling, the First & City Bank Building, Lexington, Ky., also is receiving donations for the fund.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, last week I introduced into the House H. R. 158, in effect providing that there shall be made by five Members of this House a study of foreign investments made by American bankers. I offered the resolution because news had been circulated that a loan of some $60,000,000 was about to be negotiated by the Kingdom of Rumania; that Blair & Co., the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and other bankers here and abroad were about to participate in that loan and that the bankers were also about to ask for approval of the loan by the State Department. That proposition then brought up the whole subject of foreign loans. I have examined the subject carefully. I find it most intricate, and I question the right of the Secretary of State to assume or usurp the authority to pass upon these loans and to accept or to reject the loans when applications are made therefor by bankers. A Member of the upper House, the distinguished Senator from Virginia, some time last October likewise made a remonstrance and pointed out that there was nothing in the Constitution, and that there was no warrant in law for the Secretary of State or any member of the President's Cabinet or the President himself to pass upon these private loans in that manner. Gentlemen, it occurs to me that if there is any authority to pass upon the policy of our Government that policy shall be deliberated upon and formulated here in Congress; that it is our function. It is not the function of any executive department to determine whether or not the internal conditions of a foreign sovereignty, or the general international conditions of a foreign sovereignty warrant the granting of private American capital for enterprises in those foreign lands.

Gentlemen, prior to the war we were more or less of a debtor nation. Great Britain seemed to be the creditor nation; but since the war "the mantle of Elijah," as it were, "has descended upon Elisha,"—upon the United States, the lusty descendant of Great Britain. I shall insert in the RECORD some very significant figures, indicating, in pursuance of a report from the Department of Commerce, that on January 1, 1928, leaving aside the loans made by our own Government to the Allies, the private investments abroad by American bankers (the securities of which are held all over this land) totaled $11,611,364,730. The figures I desire to insert are as follows:

Total foreign securities publicly offered in the United States from January 1, 1914, to January 1, 1928

Division:	Amount
Europe	$5,543,102,025
Canada and Newfoundland	2,689,457,015
Latin America	2,410,774,850
Far East	794,772,000
Territorial possessions	173,258,840
Grand total	11,611,364,730

TOTAL EUROPEAN FINANCING IN AMERICAN MARKET

For years American enterprise was financed by European capital, and it was not until the World War, as above stated, that the flow of capital into the United States was stopped. The war made it necessary for European Governments to turn to America for financial assistance and postwar reconstruction has continued this borrowing. Much of this capital borrowed by European countries was short term and has been paid off; however, the following table shows the extent of European borrowing in the American market through the sale of publicly offered securities from January 1, 1914, to January 1, 1928:

Country:	Amount
Austria	$86,620,875
Belgium	330,900,000
Bulgaria	4,500,000
Czechoslovakia	59,250,000
Denmark	157,136,500
Estonia	4,000,000
Finland	51,000,000
France	1,163,173,000
Germany	893,038,400
Greece	14,600,000
Hungary	65,145,000
Italy	376,539,900
Irish Free State	15,000,000
Luxemburg	7,500,000
Netherlands	122,222,500
Norway	197,442,500
Poland	97,325,750
Rumania	3,750,000
Russia	35,000,000
Saar Territory	11,500,000
Spain	25,000,000
Sweden	119,855,350
Switzerland	105,000,000
Yugoslavia	64,285,000
United Kingdom	1,533,317,250
Total (Europe)	5,543,102,025

CANADIAN FINANCING IN THE AMERICAN MARKET

American investors have long been more familiar with Canada as a field for investment than they have with the European countries. Before the war American foreign investments were very small when compared with those of Great Britain, France, and Germany. However, American investments at that time were centered primarily in Canada, Mexico, and Cuba. Since the war we have continued to purchase Canadian securities; to enlarge our interest in their commercial enterprises, as well as to increase the number of American branch factories there. This circumstance has been very natural because Canada and the United States are adjacent; the commercial laws of the two countries and the methods of doing business are very similar. The close proximity of the two countries and their close business relationship make it very difficult to compile records of the American-Canadian security issues. The following table shows the amount of borrowing done in the American market by Canada and Newfoundland through the sale of publicly offered securities from January 1, 1914, to January 1, 1928:

Country:	Amount
Canada	$2,689,457,015
Newfoundland	25,035,000
Total	2,689,457,015

LATIN-AMERICAN FINANCING IN THE NEW YORK MARKET

Prior to the World War, Latin-American governmental and corporate financing was generally done in England, France, and Germany. American offerings of Latin-American issues were confined primarily to Mexico and Cuba. Since the war practically every country in South and Central America has obtained funds in this market. We have financed Latin-American Governments, States, Provinces, and municipalities. Latin-American corporations have obtained funds in this market either through public offerings of securities or by means of private and direct investment. As previously pointed out, these compilations show only public offerings. The following table shows the extent of Latin-American borrowing in the American market through the sale of publicly offered securities from January 1, 1914, to January 1, 1928:

Country:	Amount
Argentina	$643,809,250
Bolivia	54,480,000
Brazil	330,133,950
Chile	353,063,300
Colombia	143,166,250
Costa Rica	10,820,000

AMERICAN FINANCING OF THE FAR EAST

America was one of the first countries to lend financial aid to the countries of the Far East; however, most of the borrowing through public offering of securities in this market has been postwar. The following table shows to what extent far eastern countries have borrowed in the American market through publicly offered securities from January 1, 1914, to January 1, 1928:

Country:	Amount
Australia	$193,938,000
China	10,752,000
Netherland East Indies	180,815,000
Japan	308,917,000
Palestine	350,000
Total	794,772,000

AMERICAN FINANCING OF HER TERRITORIES

Although American territorial possessions are not in the same class as other foreign investments, they have been included as part of our foreign financing. The following table shows the amount of borrowing done in the American market by territorial possessions through the sale of publicly offered securities from January 1, 1914, to January 1, 1928:

Country:	Amount
Alaska	$1,625,000
Hawaii	33,959,000
Philippine Islands	61,777,500
Porto Rico	75,897,340
Total (Territorial possessions)	173,258,840

I am informed that the total private investments or loans will probably equal to date the staggering amount of almost $12,000,000,000, and all of those loans, apparently, were passed upon by the State Department. I ask by what right? And we can very significantly ask some pointed questions of the Secretary of State. What trained banker, for example, in the State Department supervises these loans and lends counsel and advice to the Secretary as to whether or not these loans shall be made? What foreign expert studies the situation abroad for the benefit of the State Department? Are those advisers partial? Are they impartial? Are any of the bankers in New York or elsewhere favored while their rivals are not favored? We do not know. We are left in total ignorance of the situation. I applied to the Secretary of State for information and received a letter containing what he terms to be the general policy with reference to these loans. There was nothing specific in the letter, and he gave me what had long since been published in the press.

Reading from a clipping from the United States Daily, the State Department apparently stated that—there was no need of an investigation of its policy of disapproving foreign loans, as proposed by Representative CELLER, since all the facts are on file in the department and will be supplied Congress at any time upon request.

In pursuance of that statement I applied to the Secretary of State for information as to what loans had been disapproved, and my office was informed over the phone that it would be quite embarrassing to the Secretary of State and quite impolitic and a breach of confidence to disclose the nature of those loans which had merited the Secretary's disapproval. So apparently what the Secretary says in one breath does not square with what the Secretary says in another breath. Mind you, I have no personal quarrel with the Secretary or his department. I simply take exception to his policy.

Now, he also informed me several weeks ago, when I asked him to proscribe the loan to Rumania, for reasons which I have indicated on this floor, and particularly because of the atrocities of this benighted nation, that it was not within the province of the Secretary of State to interfere with the internal or domestic conditions of any country, let alone Rumania. Yet, let me read to you a very significant paragraph from a volume entitled "American Foreign Investments," by Robert W. Dunn, on page 17 thereof, and I ask you to listen attentively:

The importance of the war loan obligations, when it is desired to bring pressure to bear on countries whose national interests cross those of the American investors, was illustrated in 1924 in the case of Rumania.

This is the very country that was the subject of correspondence between the Secretary of State and myself and loans to which I am now asking be proscribed.

The Rumanian Government enacted legislation tending to nationalize its oil supplies. This was resented by American oil companies, which had invested in Rumania. The State Department synchronously reminded the Rumanian Government that her loan was about to be called.

And the author goes on to say:

Similar political pressure is possible at any time through these great national loans owed to the United States Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows that, while a loan may be discounted at 90 bearing 6 per cent interest, there is no sentiment in a little thing like religious persecution which would keep bankers from making such a loan.

Mr. CELLER. Quite right; I have just shown you that the oil interests of the country brought pressure to bear upon the State Department or the other departments involved and that they in turn coerced the Rumanian Government, interfering directly, without any question, in the internal policy of the Rumanian Government, only there dollars were involved and in my proposition lives are involved. The State Department seems to imply by its conduct that lives mean nothing to it and dollars mean apparently a great deal.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Dollars mean a great deal to all bankers.

Thus the executive departments actually do interfere with domestic conditions of foreign sovereignties. We are doing it, surely, in Nicaragua and Haiti.

Mr. CELLER. It is meet, gentlemen, that we examine into this subject and find out something about it, because, when we get $12,000,000,000 of securities of foreign nations, that same amount of capital comes over into this country eventually, and we, therefore, have an important stake in every country to which we make such a loan. Having that stake, the stake must be protected, and it can only be protected by the Army and by the Navy and by the marines, and may involve us eventually in war.

Such huge investments raise questions of important American and foreign fiscal policies. These loans involve many conflicting interests in many of the countries where the loans are made. Some companies may be favored in these loans as against other companies. Furthermore, the American bankers are compelled to follow and try to guide political conditions in those countries. Pressure must inevitably be brought to bear upon the State Department to endeavor to have it in turn shape or bend political conditions in the foreign country favorably to the preservation of the loan.

These huge obligations to us give us a lever by which it may and undoubtedly will finally exercise great influence for peace or war in Europe and South and Central America and in the Far East. These loans will embroil us in all sorts of difficulties. Surely Congress has the power to lay down a policy as to these loans. It should seize the right and not allow the State Department to exercise the power. At least my resolution merits serious consideration. The subject should be studied.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to urge upon the attention of the House H. R. 6068, which I have introduced, to amend section 15 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act.

The Federal farm loan act, as I have had frequent occasion to say, is, in my opinion, one of the greatest pieces of constructive legislation ever enacted by Congress for the benefit of the farmers.

The amendment which I propose provides for the appointment of local agents by the Federal Farm Loan Board in the various localities where local farm loan associations fail, neglect, or refuse to properly serve the needs of any section of the country.

The amendment confers upon such local agent about the same authority which the secretary-treasurer of a local loan association now has. It does not in any material respect change the existing law. The loans which are applied for, through applications filed with such agents, would continue to be subject to the same conditions.

My contention is that this amendment, if adopted, would greatly popularize the Federal farm loan act and would result in many farmers availing themselves of its provisions and greatly expedite action upon loans by the farm land banks.

The Farm Loan Board, reporting upon a bill of a similar nature which I introduced at the last session of Congress, heartily commended its provisions and submitted the following report thereon:

This bill would amend the farm loan act so as to provide that Federal land banks may accept applications for loans through agents in territory where it has been determined that national farm loan associations have not been formed, or that the associations, when formed, neglect or refuse to serve the needs of their territory.

The board does not oppose this legislation, but, on the contrary, believes that it might be of material assistance to eligible farmers in a great many sections of the United States. If your committee should favor the principle of this bill, I shall be very glad to go over the details with you with the thought of assisting in perfecting it.

At an oral hearing before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House the members of the Farm Loan Board heartily commended the proposed amendment.

Section 15 of the rural credits bill, approved July 17, 1916, provides for the appointment of agents only when no local loan association has been formed, and the agent so appointed must be an incorporated bank, trust company, mortgage company, or savings institution chartered by the State, and this agent is required to indorse and become liable for the payment of each loan.

The amount of the loans to be made by such agent is limited to ten times the amount of the capital and surplus of such institution. Such agent is permitted to be paid not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent of the principal of the loan, and this amount must be deducted from the dividends payable to the borrower, and if no dividends are paid to the borrower, of course no commission is paid to the agent.

There is a further provision of my bill that in the event of the organization of a local loan association no further loans can be negotiated through the agent so appointed. No bank or trust company, in my judgment, can afford to accept the agency under these conditions. None have been appointed, so far as I know, in the State of Oklahoma. None have been appointed where local loan associations have been formed but have ceased to be active. The amendment to which I am directing your attention provides that whenever it appears to the board that local farm loan associations have not been formed, or where such associations have been formed but have failed, neglected, or refused to properly serve the needs of the territory in its locality, it does not require the appointment of a bank or trust company, and the agents appointed are to give bond, serve at the pleasure of the board, and receive as compensation not exceeding 1 per cent of the amount of the loan made, with a minimum fee of $5 for each loan. In the event a local association is organized and properly serves the community no further loans are to be made through such agent.

All of the farm land banks formed, including the bank at Wichita, Kans., which serves Oklahoma, and the members of the Farm Loan Board, have indorsed the provisions of this proposed amendment.

A farm loan board was created under the provisions of the farm loan act of July 17, 1916, with general supervisory control over the 12 banks which were to be located throughout the country. These banks were authorized to make loans to farmers upon the amortization plan. The farmer is charged no greater rate of interest than that which is required to be paid upon tax-exempt farm land bank bonds, which are authorized to be issued and sold, plus the expenses of management, and 1 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, is added, to be applied to the reduction of the principal. The last issue of farm land bank bonds bears a rate of 4 per cent. If financial conditions improve a 4 per cent tax-exempt farm land bank bond should sell at a premium. United States Treasury certificates offered a few days ago, bearing a rate of interest of 3⅜ per cent, were sold at par. The rate of interest charged the farmers by the farm land banks ranges from 5 per cent to 5½ per cent, in addition to the 1 per cent amortization applied to the reduction of the principal. The St. Paul and Columbia Farm Land Banks charge a rate of interest of 5¼ per cent at the present time, the Spokane Bank 5½ per cent, and all the other farm land banks, including the bank at Wichita, Kans, which serves Oklahoma, charges a rate of 5 per cent for their loans, to which, as I have explained, is added 1 per cent to be applied to the reduction of the principal, making a total interest rate of 6 per cent to be paid by the farmers for both principal and interest.

The statement of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau shows that there have been loans closed by the 12 banks amounting to $1,463,918,114. The loans made by the farm land bank at Wichita, which serves Oklahoma, amount to $117,063,750.

The success of this legislation has long been assured. There can be no doubt of it. Its great importance to the farmers of the country is recognized.

When this legislation was enacted the farmers throughout the West were paying 10 per cent interest on loans, but upon the passage of the rural credits act interest rates were reduced by mortgage companies and insurance companies making such loans so that a lower interest rate is now being charged to the farmers and more favorable terms given as to renewals. This proposed amendment is designed to popularize this law and to interest the farmers generally so that they will avail themselves of its provisions. Many of them do not understand it. A live active, intelligent local agent would be of great benefit in explaining the details and all the requirements necessary to negotiate a loan.

Many farmers do not know that they can borrow money now at 5 per cent, add 1 per cent to be applied to the reduction of principal, so that by paying a total of 6 per cent interest they take care of both the principal and interest. The secretary-treasurer of the local loan association is not as active as a local agent would be and does not render the farmers the assistance that a local agent would be able to give to them in making the preliminary preparations to forward the papers to the bank which serves the district. The more loans made to the farmers will effect a proportionate deduction of the expense of administration and a gradual reduction of the interest charged.

There are approximately 6,500,000 farmers in the United States. Including members of their families, one-third of the population of the United States, approximately 40,000,000 people, live on farms and are directly dependent upon farming for a living. Almost everyone is dependent upon the prosperity of the farmer and directly dependent upon him for food supplies. Therefore the prosperity of the farmer affects the entire citizenship of the country.

The amendment which I am urging, in my judgment, is necessary and would greatly help to expedite loans and popularize the law and induce more farmers to take advantage of its provisions. Many farmers, in the first place, are reluctant, to join local loan associations. They prefer to pay and do pay a higher rate of interest to loan companies. In the second place it has been my experience, from a study of the local loan associations formed in my district, that when a number of farmers get together and form such an association and secure their own loans, the association is thereafter inactive so far as attempting to induce additional farmers to take advantage of it is concerned.

In my own district with eight counties, four of them—Adair, McIntosh, Okmulgee, and Sequoyah—have no local loan associations and therefore receive no advantages from the law, except where an applicant for a loan may be attached to an adjoining county, and there are but few of these. The other four counties—Cherokee, Haskell, Muskogee, and Wagoner—have local associations. Up to October, 1923, there was loaned through the associations in these four counties as follows:

Cherokee County, 37 members, amount of loans $65,400; Haskell County, 22 members, amount of loans $39,400; Muskogee County, 29 members, amount of loans $89,200; and Wagoner County, 42 members, amount of loans $138,900. During the period from November 1, 1923, to October 31, 1924, only 3 new members were served in Cherokee County, 2 in Haskell County, 2 in Muskogee County, and 1 in Wagoner County; or 8 in all. Total amount loaned aggregated $30,600. During the period from November 1, 1924, to October 31, 1925, 7 new members were served in Cherokee County, 7 in Haskell County, 2 in Muskogee County, and none in Wagoner County; or a total of 16. To these 16 new members only $29,200 was loaned during the past year.

During the past 2 years only 57 new loans were made to borrowers in the eight counties, which shows that the local associations are not sufficiently active.

The reason for this is plain. Section 7 of the rural credits bill provides for the election of officers of local associations "and a loan committee of three members." All officers, except the secretary-treasurer, serve without compensation. Only the "reasonable expenses of the loan committee" are paid by the association.

Section 10 provides that when a prospective borrower makes application for a loan it shall be first referred to the "loan committee" provided for in section 7 of the act.

The loan committee is required to examine the land offered as security, make a detailed written report signed by all three members, give the appraisal of the land as found by them, and such other information as may be required by the rules and regulations, and no loan can be approved without a favorable report.

The difficulty is in securing an active "loan committee" to function without compensation after they have themselves been served. The above figures show that they have not been active, at least in my district, and therefore the importance of making loans through an agent such as I have proposed in the amendment which I have submitted.

The table which I am submitting herewith conclusively shows that the local loan associations, once formed, and after the original charter members secure their money, are not active in pressing the advantages of the law upon others and inducing them to take advantage of it.

Statement showing loans closed from organization of the Federal land bank to October 31, 1925, by counties, in second congressional district, State of Oklahoma

Counties	Organization to Oct. 31, 1923		Nov. 1, 1923, to Oct. 31, 1924		Nov. 1, 1924, to Oct. 31, 1925

Total	136	343,800	8	30,600	16	29,200

The total number of loans made up to February 29, 1928, in Oklahoma, was 9,275, and the amount of the loans aggregated the sum of $25,878,800.

Loans may be made to the amount of 50 per cent of the appraised value of the land and 20 per cent of the appraised value of the insured, permanent improvements.

If a local agent, to whom would be paid a minimum fixed fee for his compensation, were appointed in each county to represent the farm land bank serving that district, he would be able to familiarize the farmers with the requirements of the law, aid them in preparing their papers, and would be able to give them such information as to procedure and as to the amount they could probably secure on their lands, thereby minimizing the number of loans rejected and expedite the consideration of all applications for loans. In my judgment, this is a matter of great importance to the farmers throughout the country. Everybody appreciates that the farmers have been depressed during the past few years, and we have been endeavoring to find a proper solution for their problems. I have taken occasion heretofore to say that in my judgment it will require the enactment of a series of bills to solve the problems of the farmers. I wish to emphasize this particular amendment which I am pressing upon the attention of the Members of the House. I believe that if this amendment were enacted it would aid many of the worthy, thrifty, honest, and economical tenant farmers to own their own farms.

The Census Bureau reports that in Oklahoma there are 197,218 farms. Of these, 81,226 are operated by their owners, 115,498 by tenant farmers, and 494 by managers.

I want to make it possible for every tenant farmer to own his own home. If I have any hobby it is to help every man to live on his own land. The enactment of this amendment would do much to accomplish that. The local agent could bring to the attention of the tenant farmer the advantages of this law and would show him how to make his application, and this would encourage him to try to buy a farm for himself and would result in untold thousands of them buying small tracts of land, giving the first mortgage to the farm land banks, and giving a second mortgage for the balance of the purchase price. He would be enabled to pay off his loan to the farm land bank through a long-time loan and through industry, thrift, and economy he would be able to gradually pay off the second mortgage and finally own his home.

Now, let us examine the benefits that would result from this. When a man owns his own land he conserves the soil, he rotates the crops, diversifies the products he plants; he uses his spare hours in repairing and building improvements, he terraces the land to prevent the soil from washing away, he fills up the ditches, he puts out a small orchard, and gives more attention to studying the crops adapted to the particular soil which he owns. In this way of caring for and cultivating the land it is made stronger and more productive and enables the farmer to raise at least 50 per cent more per acre at but little, if any, greater expense. The taxes are no greater and the cost of maintenance is about the same.

Now, if the farmers, through better methods, are enabled to raise 50 per cent more corn, wheat, cotton, alfalfa, and other products upon the same acreage, he has that much more to sell and has therefore reduced the cost of production. It necessarily adds greatly to his prosperity and correspondingly adds to the prosperity of the community and the entire Nation.

Agriculture is our basic industry, and this is particularly true of my district. Every person living in the towns and cities is largely dependent upon the farmer and is as deeply interested in the prosperity of the farmer as the farmer is himself. Every merchant, banker, laboring or professional man in interested in legislation which will be of advantage to the farmer.

If we can, by legislation, make it possible for the farmer to borrow money for long terms at low rates of interest, it will encourage more farmers to own their own homes and will surely add to their prosperity and to that of the entire country as well.

This bill will not weaken the present law but will strengthen and popularize it, and I hope to continue to press it upon the attention of Congress until this or some similar amendment receives favorable consideration. In the meantime I want to urge upon the people of my State and the country the advisability of their studying the provisions of this law, forming local associations, and taking advantage of its terms.

The provisions of the rural credits bill can only be availed of by the owners of farms or those desiring to purchase farm lands. Loans are made only to purchase farms, pay off mortgages, purchase equipment, fertilizer, and livestock, to provide buildings and other improvements of farm lands, and no loan can be made at a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent. The original act was a splendid piece of constructive legislation. It should be amended as I have indicated. [Applause.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, all time for general debate has expired, and I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CLERK

Salaries: Clerk of the House of Representatives, including compensation as disbursing officer of the contingent fund, $6,500; Journal clerk and two reading clerks, at $4,200 each; disbursing clerk, $3,570; tally clerk, $3,470; file clerk, $3,420; enrolling clerk, $3,200 and $1,000 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent; property custodian and superintendent of furniture and repair shop, who shall be a skilled cabinetmaker or upholsterer and experienced in the construction and purchase of furniture, $3,600; two assistant custodians at $3,000 each; chief bill clerk, $3,150; assistant enrolling clerk, $2,880; assistant to disbursing clerk, $2,780; stationery clerk, $2,570; librarian, $2,460; assistant librarian, $2,240; assistant file clerk, $2,250; assistant librarian, and assistant Journal clerk, at $2,150 each; clerks—one at $2,150, three at $2,020 each; bookkeeper, and assistant in disbursing office, at $1,940 each; four assistants to chief bill clerk, at $1,830 each; stenographer to the Clerk, $1,730; locksmith and typewriter repairer, $1,620; messenger and clock repairer, $1,520; assistant in stationery room, $1,520; three messengers, at $1,410 each; stenographer to Journal clerk, $1,310; 15 telephone operators, at $1,320 each; substitute telephone operator when required, at $3.30 per day, $1,200; laborers—three at $1,200 each, nine at $1,010 each; purchase, exchange, operation, maintenance, and repair of motor vehicle, $1,200; in all, $132,220.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 23, at the beginning of the line, strike out the figures "$4,200" and insert "$5,000"; and at the end of line 23 strike out "$3,470" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides for the two reading clerks, the Journal clerk, and the tally clerk. There are no positions in the entire organization of the House that are more important than these four places at the desk.

The incorporation of amendments and the preparation of bills by the reading clerks for the engrossing office and the journalizing by the Journal clerk of the action of the House in the passage of bills are as important and require as much skill and care as the original preparation of a bill.

For assistance in the preparation of bills we pay our legislative counsel a salary of $10,000, and it is worth every cent of it. I am certain there is no member of the committee who will not agree that the service of these men at the desk is not worth at least half that amount.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Were these proposed changes brought by the gentleman from Missouri to the attention of the committee in the preparation of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. I do not believe that any member of the committee would take the position that these men are not entitled to the salaries proposed in this amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. That does not answer the question. The question I asked was this: Were these proposed changes brought by the gentleman from Missouri or anyone else to the attention of the committee in the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. No; they were not brought up, but other increases were included in the bill and I hoped these were overlooked by the committee through inadvertence.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman will realize this. This bill is filled with items respecting people who are immediately in contact with the membership of the House and the Senate. The committee has gone over these items with great care. If an increase is made here and there just because some one makes an appeal on the floor, it is a little difficult to know where it would end, because I dare say that most of these items could arouse some friends on the floor of the House. My own attitude in making the point of order against the amendment which is subject to the point of order, would be, simply that it would be dangerous to start a policy here of, on the impulse of the moment, raising a salary here and there, when it is a matter that ought to have very careful consideration.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman knows that we have in the bill before us quite a number of items that are subject to points of order. Would he not be willing to leave this to the action of the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CRAMTON. If the policy were once entered on of making these amendments everyone would have its appeal. We have many efficient employees attached to the House. If you once start in a policy of just at random offering amendments without any occasion on the part of the committee for investigation, no one could tell where the end would be.

Mr. CANNON. I realize the justice of what the gentleman says, but there is no rule which is not, on occasion, honored in the breach, and I am asking in this instance that he give the Committee of the Whole the opportunity to pass on the matter.

The gentleman is aware that while the reading clerks of the House receive but $4,200, the reading clerk in the Senate receives $5,500, although the relative burden of duties is in the proportion of 96, the membership of the Senate, to 440, the membership of the House. Let me add that our present reading clerks by their efficiency are actually saving a much larger sum than that provided in this amendment. When they took their position at the desk it required an average of 45 minutes to call the roll. Under the present régime, by virtue of reforms initiated by them, only 23 minutes is consumed in calling the roll.

It has been estimated that the cost of running the House is approximately $1,971 per hour. At this rate it is at once apparent that a very material sum has been saved and is being saved on every roll call, a saving directly due to the efficiency of these men at the desk.

The Journal clerk is also entitled to special consideration on the part of the House for large sums saved in the administration of his office. Through reforms instituted at his suggestion an amount estimated by the Government Printing Office to approximate $2,650 is being saved every session in the printing of the Journal, an amount greatly in excess of the small increase provided by the proposed amendment.

Likewise the duties of the tally clerk have been added to in the last few years, until he is now handling twice the business formerly required of that office, including some of the most important and most exacting duties in the routine of the House.

I trust the gentleman will take these facts into consideration and permit the committee to vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist upon his point of order?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I do, simply for the reason stated. There is an appeal in what the gentleman suggests and a good deal of justice in the demand that he makes; but the gentleman knows that if the bars are let down to unconsidered amendments without investigation, it would be hard to tell where the end would be. I understand some increases were granted that are perhaps subject to the point of order, but those were made only after most careful investigation and expressions from House authorities. For the reason I give, I shall be obliged to make the point of order. I make the point of order that there is a statutory limitation which is exceeded by the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard upon the point of order? If not, the Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMITTEE EMPLOYEES

Clerks, messengers, and janitors to the following committees: Accounts—clerk, $3,300; assistant clerk, $2,150; janitor, $1,310. Agriculture—clerk, $2,880; assistant clerk, $2,150; janitor, $1,310. Ways and Means—clerk, $4,200; assistant clerk and stenographer, $2,360; assistant clerk, $2,250; clerk for the minority, $2,880; janitors—one $1,310, one $1,010. World War Veterans' Legislation—clerk, $2,880; assistant clerk, $2,150. In all, $250,230.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Page 14, in line 2, after the figures "$2,360," insert "assistant clerk, $1,800."

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I have only this to say to the committee. I presented the facts in this matter to the Committee on Accounts before the opening of the session.

The Committee on Roads is having very heavy work this year. The legislation has taken more time and has required more work than has ever occurred in the history of this committee. It is a committee of 21 members. The legislation is such that it pertains to every section of the United States, and every section of the United States is interested in this legislation; and the work has grown so much in the past two years that it is necessary to have this additional help. I am hoping that the point of order will not be pressed, because I know if the gentleman knew the situation he would not press it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What has the Committee on Accounts to say about this? Did the gentleman bring that to the attention of the committee and show them the necessity?

Mr. DOWELL. Before the work of the session began. Persons are making inquiry constantly through Members of the House and of the Senate with reference to the status of the legislation, and the committee has been busier than ever before in the history of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not going to take the liberty to make objection to it, but is it not a dangerous precedent to set?

Mr. DOWELL. If it were not for the necessity I have mentioned I would not ask for it at this time. There is a necessity for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio insist on his point of order?

Mr. MURPHY. I shall have to insist on the point of order. The gentleman could have come before our committee but he knew, no doubt, that the Committee on Appropriations does not attempt to legislate at any time. We do try at times to smooth out a rough place here and there, and to equalize salaries at this end of the Capitol to correspond with those at the other end. The gentleman from Iowa did not bring this to our attention. While I recognize the force of what the gentleman says and realize the situation he describes, we feel that it is not an orderly manner in which to enact legislation.

Mr. DOWELL. There is no question about the point of order. The amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MURPHY. Our committee is told that there is a bill being shaped up in the Committee on Accounts to take care of just such a situation.

I shall have to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Janitors under the foregoing shall be appointed by the chairmen, respectively, of said committees, and shall perform under the direction of the Doorkeeper all of the duties heretofore required of messengers detailed to said committees by the Doorkeeper, and shall be subject to removal by the Doorkeeper at any time after the termination of the Congress during which they were appointed.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts we would ask to pass over the reading from line 1 to line 7 at the top of page 15, and lines 17 to 25 on page 17. I ask unanimous consent to pass it over until to-morrow, because there are one or two Members who are interested in these two items and want to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman if the language in the last paragraph just read is the same as that heretofore carried by the bill for the legislative department?

Mr. MURPHY. It is the same.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It does not cover any employees except those that were heretofore employed under the same provision?

Mr. MURPHY. No.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that some one should draw attention to the fact that we have men working here who possibly are trying to raise families on $84 a month, or $1,010 a year. It seems to me that if we are going to increase wages anywhere to employees of the Government we ought to begin here where we know men perform functions that are important. We know they are doing the same thing in the departments, and when we hire a man for $84 a month and know he can not rent a house under $25 or $30, how he lives is beyond me. It seems to me we should increase these salaries at this time. I certainly hope when this bill reaches the Senate, if it is not done here, something will be done to give a living wage to the men who work in the House of Representatives, a place where men surely ought to be paid enough to live on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST OFFICE

Salaries: Postmaster, $4,200; assistant postmaster, $2,570; registry and money-order clerk, $2,000; assistant registry and money-order clerk, $1,800; five case distributors at $1,700 each; record and file clerk, $1,700; twenty-seven messengers (including one to superintend transportation of mails), at $1,520 each; for the employment of substitute messengers and extra services of regular employees at the rate of not to exceed $125 per month each, $1,000; laborer, $1,010; in all, $63,820.

Mr. ROBINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBINSON of Iowa: Page 16, line 10, after the word "and," strike out the figures "$420" and insert "$540."

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment. That item has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio reserves a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Iowa. If the point of order is pressed I would like to ask unanimous consent to return to this. I was unavoidably detained and have just arrived in the House. I hope the point of order will be overlooked.

Mr. MURPHY. The paragraph has been read, Mr. Chairman. It has been passed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to return to it for a moment. We are only a few lines beyond it.

Mr. MURPHY. For what purpose?

Mr. ROBINSON of Iowa. To offer an amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio to make a point of order against the amendment if we return to the paragraph cited?

Mr. MURPHY. It is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, $16,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 20, line 2, strike out the figures "$16,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$20,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURPHY: Page 20, line 2, strike out the sign and figures "$16,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$20,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay William Tyler Page, Clerk of the House of Representatives, for services in compiling, arranging for the printer, reading proof, indexing testimony, stenography and typewriting, supervision of the work, and expenses incurred in the contested-election cases of the Seventieth Congress, as authorized by the act entitled "An act relating to contested elections," approved March 2, 1887, $2,483.68, and an additional sum to such persons as were actually engaged in the work, designated by him, and in such proportions as he may deem just for the assistance rendered in the work, $1,516.32; in all, $4,000.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MACGREGOR: On page 21, after line 5, insert "That the Clerk of the House is authorized to disburse out of the miscellaneous item of the contingent fund, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Committee on Accounts and subject to its approval, not in excess of the sum of $5,000 for the physical and medical examination of Members of the House of Representatives."

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment, which I know is subject to a point of order, for the purpose of calling the attention of the Members of the House to the advisability, to my mind, of having some method of physical examination of our Members.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mental?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Physical, I said. There was inserted in the RECORD this morning by the ranking minority member of this subcommittee, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], a statement showing the number of deaths which have occurred in this House during past Congresses. For instance, in the Sixtieth Congress we lost 10; in the Sixty-first Congress, 11; in the Sixty-second Congress, 11; in the Sixty-third Congress, 12; in the Sixty-fourth Congress, 7; in the Sixty-fifth Congress, 15; in the Sixty-sixth Congress, 14; in the Sixty-seventh Congress, 19; in the Sixty-eighth Congress, 17; in the Sixty-ninth Congress, 9; and so far this session we have lost 5.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do I understand that this examination is to be an examination of candidate before election or an examination after election

Mr. MacGREGOR. Perhaps it should be an examination before election, but the amendment provides for an examination after election.

Mr. CRAMTON. To be entirely effective it should provide for an examination of candidates before election.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman from New York if he is serious in offering this amendment

Mr. MacGREGOR. I am quite serious about it myself.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It strikes me as being a very extraordinary and unusual thing to propose. There is no more reason why the Members of the House should be physically passed upon than that the pages should receive the same benefit.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Let me tell the gentleman the reason. I have been to the Secretary of War and I have been to the Surgeon General of the Army and the Surgeon General of the Navy and have tried to see if some arrangement could not be made whereby we could have an annual physical examination of Members of the House.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If it would include everybody in the United States, there would be some excuse for it, but not when applied to the membership of the House alone.

Mr. MACGREGOR. There is plenty of excuse for it, and I am trying to tell the gentleman the reason for it if the gentleman will permit.

It has cost us the sum of $169,905 since the Sixtieth Congress to pay the funeral expenses of Members. In addition to this it has cost us nearly $1,000,000 since the Fifty-ninth Congress for payment of the allowances we make to the families of Members upon death. If that is not sufficient, I do not know what would be.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the gentleman assume that by a medical examination all of these deaths and funerals could have been prevented?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I assume that a good many of them could have been prevented, because the time to control a disease is when it starts, and this you, perhaps, do by an examination of this kind.

The Surgeon General of the Army has told me it would be a perfectly wonderful thing if he could induce Members of Congress when at their homes to go to their own physicians every six months or every year and have such an examination made, and thus set an example for the people generally.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I know there is such a campaign being conducted throughout the country for the improvement of the general health of the people.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I would be very delighted if we could get this idea into the minds of the Members of the House, and I am trying to bring this before the Members through this method of providing for such a physical examination.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And it is to be done at Government expense.

Mr. MACGREGOR. We would be saving money.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It seems to me a very farfetched proposition and one I could never agree to.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. I am one of those who believes we are responsible ourselves for the condition the gentleman refers to. We eat too much, sleep too little, and exercise less than we should. If we corrected these things, we would not need such an examination.

Mr. MACGREGOR. But we will not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MURPHY. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read down to and including line 15, page 22.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAWLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12875, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BURTON, for one day, on account of important business.

PENSIONS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Pensions, I call up the bill (H. R. 12381) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and so forth, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I understand this is a unanimous report, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered as read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

This bill is a substitute for the following House bills referred to said committee:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

A bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred to the appropriate committee, as follows:

S. 3555. An act to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce; to the Committee on Agriculture.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 3224. An act to extend the provisions of the forest exchange act, approved March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 465), to the Crater National Forest, in the State of Oregon; and

S. 3225. An act to enlarge the boundaries of the Crater National Forest.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States for his approval a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 10564. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to grant and convey to the county of Warren a perpetual easement for public highway purposes over and upon a portion of the Vicksburg National Military Park in the State of Mississippi.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 14, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Mr. TILSON submitted the following tentative list of committee hearings scheduled for Saturday, April 14, 1928, as reported to the floor leader by clerks of the several committees:

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

(10.30 a. m.)

To provide for the transfer to the Department of the Interior of the public-works functions of the Federal Government (H. R. 8127).

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, April 14, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the Father of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, Thy purpose for this world is the development of man; all creation is engaged in this redeeming task. Let us not despise the lowest of Thy creatures, nor lose the glory and the worth of humble service and simple things. The divine at the heart of the universe keeps working away at the divine in man, and one day, like the prophet of old, he will be lifted up out of his ignorance and sin into the light of a more perfect day. Amid commotions and uncertainties, Thou art the preserver of all good; we therefore praise Thee. May our laws and institutions be molded by great Christian ideals, and always remain as the inspiration of our fellow citizens, for they are the architects and the builders of our Republic. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

IN SENATE, STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, March 5, 1928.

Whereas the project of an all-American ship canal across the State of New York, connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean, continues to be a subject of public agitation and discussion and is of deep concern to the people of the State of New York and to the Nation at large; and

Whereas in the consideration of such project it has been urged that the route of the present Erie Barge Canal should generally be followed in the construction of the work; and

Whereas many populous communities exist along such route and many industrial establishments have for years been maintained thereon that would be served and benefited by such a ship canal; and

Whereas the work being done by the General Government in making a deeper channel in the Hudson River and the establishment of a port at Albany are well under way; and

Whereas the confluence of the Erie Barge Canal and of the Champlain Barge Canal is at the head of tidewater in the Hudson River at Troy: Now therefore be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That if the Federal Government shall decide to build a ship canal across the State of New York and the constitution of this State shall be amended in the prescribed manner so as to permit of the transfer to that Government of the existing Erie Barge Canal as a part of a national waterways route, it is the earnest recommendation of the legislature of this State that the eastern portion of such ship canal shall be built to follow the historic route of the Mohawk River and the Erie Barge Canal to the head of tidewater in the Hudson River at Troy, thus securing the advantages of existing canal structures and the continued serving and further development of the municipalities and the numerous important industries now established both along such route and in and between the cities of Albany, Troy, Schenectady, Watervliet, Rensselaer, and Cohoes; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the clerk of this senate to each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of New York.

By order of the Senate.

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

IN ASSEMBLY, March 21, 1928.

Concurred in without amendment.

By order of the assembly.

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

BENJAMIN S. M'HENRY

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4702) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Benjamin S. McHenry, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4702) and concur in the Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Benjamin S. McHenry, alias Henry Benjamin, late of Company K, Third Regiment United States Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 17th day of May, 1867: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowances shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act for the relief of Benjamin S. McHenry, alias Henry Benjamin."

Mr. SNELL. Is that the usual language?

Mr. MORIN. This simply puts in the Senate's own language.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I tried to follow the reading by the Clerk, and it struck me that the Senate bill specifically gives this soldier all the rights that may accrue from any existing law, while the House bill specifically excludes him from those benefits.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

THE WORLD WAR VETERANS' ACT OF 1924

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 10160) amending the World War veterans' act of 1924 was referred to the World War Veterans' Committee, and by it referred to a subcommittee and unanimously reported from the committee. I ask unanimous consent that I may have until 12 o'clock to-night to introduce the bill as amended and the report of the committee in order that the bill may be placed on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that he may have until 12 o'clock to-night to file the bill and report as stated.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. And to introduce a "clean bill"—the committee bill. By "clean bill" I mean one that can be easily read and easily understood.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman does not need unanimous consent, does he?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am afraid I will not be able to get the report in before the House adjourns, and I want to call it up Monday if I can.

Mr. TILSON. As I understand, the gentleman wishes to call it up under suspension of the rules, and he wishes to have the bill in a clean form?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. That is the reason.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, are we going to have the World War veterans' legislation at this session come under suspension of the rules and either have to vote it up or vote it down? The 4,000,000 World War veterans ought to have a day in the House for consideration of their legislation other than under suspension of the rules.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not know what bills we will be able to get before the House, but I would like to get this one up as soon as I can.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can not the gentleman get the bill up under a rule?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would like the gentleman to have that chance.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is not this a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. It seems to me that it is the kind of a bill that we should pass either under unanimous consent or under suspension of the rules.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Why not tell just the whole story about it? When you bring in one of these war veterans' bills, in which more than 4,000,000 people are interested, with a unanimous report from the committee, the object of the committee in having it taken up under suspension of the rules is to not give anyone an opportunity to offer an amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know that.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Because you might run away with it. With this tremendous pressure behind you, they want to take away from you the opportunity of doing something that you might do.

Mr. TILSON. Where the committee has on it as many friends of the veterans as the Veterans' Committee has, and they unanimously agree to a report, does not the gentleman think the interests of the veterans will be well taken care of by such a committee?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes; but I do not for one minute believe that the committee by unanimous vote believe that all veterans' legislation should come up under suspension of the rules. I firmly believe that the great majority of the committee, in fact, practically the entire committee, desires veterans' legislation to have its day in the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. As a practical matter, the question before the House is whether I can put this bill on the calendar, introduce it as a clean bill, report it, and pass it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, if it is to be passed under suspension of the rules, the gentleman would not necessarily need to have a "clean" bill.

Mr. TILSON. Certainly not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But if it is going to come up under suspension of the rules, I think it is quite proper that the gentleman should have the consent that he now requests so that we may at least have the opportunity of reading the bill and understanding it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. That is exactly my reason. I wanted to get such a copy of the bill before the House so that every Member could see exactly what it contained. If this consent is granted, there would be that kind of a bill. If not, then the bill to be considered will come in with its several amendments, and it will be hard to determine just what it does provide.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am sure we ought to thank the gentleman for giving us an opportunity to read the bill. I think it is very gracious of him.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am very glad to do that for my distinguished colleague from New York.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation to object I wish to state that I shall not object to this consent. Since the creation of the World War Veterans' Committee there has not been a rule so that their legislation could be considered on the floor of this House under full and free debate, with opportunity of amendment. World War veterans' legislation has generally come before the House under suspension of the rules with only 20 minutes' debate on that side and no opportunity to offer amendments. I hope that the leadership on this side will give the veterans' legislation a day on the floor of this House. We have been adjourning over Saturdays for a number of weeks. Let us take one of the coming Saturdays to consider veteran legislation.

Mr. DYER. Can not they get a Calendar Wednesday day?

Mr. SCHAFER. No. Under the rules of the House they will not have Calendar Wednesday if the House keeps in session for a hundred years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

ALLEGED ABUSE OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, a newspaper has published an article which charges my improper use of the franking privilege. Rather than rise to a question of personal privilege, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I am advised that one member of the Naval Affairs Committee has given out a statement to the effect that my franking privilege has been violated in connection with mailing out a minority report on the naval shipbuilding bill. The statement says that the House Naval Affairs Committee, in cooperation with the Post Office Department, is investigating the alleged abuse of the franking privilege by the so-called head of the National Council for the Prevention of War. I am a member of the Naval Affairs Committee. This morning I called on the acting clerk and asked him if any subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee, or the committee itself, had ever discussed that subject officially. I am advised that no such discussion has taken place. Therefore that part of the newspaper story is not true.

As far as the Post Office Department making an investigation is concerned, I have no knowledge with respect to that statement. I have invited all of the members of the Commitee on Naval Affairs to be here this morning. I want to look them right square in the eyes. If there is a member of the Naval Affairs Committee here who has given out this report, I now invite him to make himself known. Evidently he is not here.

I have the most supreme contempt for anyone who would deliberately violate his franking privilege. If my franking privilege has been violated I want the fullest investigation to be made. I want every witness to come before some committee and be put under oath so that we Members may have some protection along this line in the future.

What about these minority reports? They were printed and distributed nearly 30 days before this charge of the improper use of my frank was given to the newspapers. This morning I am advised by the National Council for the Prevention of War that the alleged extraneous statements which were claimed to have been found in my franked envelope were mailed out seven days after the envelope containing the minority report was put in the post office. Therefore, this being true, it would have been a physical impossibility for this organization to have included the alleged extraneous matter in the envelopes which carried my frank.

Now I want to say this: I wrote the minority report on the naval shipbuilding bill for the purpose of giving to the citizens of this Nation some information as to why such a program was being sponsored by the Navy. I wanted the taxpayers to know that without a single war cloud on the horizon an attempt was being made to saddle an expenditure on them without a single justifiable reason. In addition, I called attention to the fact in this report that when a proper allocation of ship tonnage had been made, the United States did not occupy a second position to any nation on earth. Furthermore, I called attention to the fact that the kind of ships sought to be authorized was the class that could not perform service in a war, unless properly protected by aircraft and other newer naval equipment. In addition, this report recommended that the kind of ships found most valuable in the last war be utilized in the future, and that our obsolete battleships be reconstructed in such a way as to make them their own aircraft carrier, thereby making it possible to use such a ship in case this country should be so unfortunate as to become involved in another war. This report was furnished to the individuals and organizations who desired information of this kind, and I made an earnest attempt to supply the needs of those who were interested in the subject of national defense.

In preparing this minority report for mailing purposes I did safeguard my office in every manner possible in this way: These minority reports were printed by the Government Printing Office. They were sent to the House folding room, a Government institution, and there I had them sealed before any disposition was made of them. In other words, they were sealed before anybody could have had an opportunity to place anything in them other than that which they contained when they were sealed.

And so the matter appears to me to be a very peculiar charge. I can not understand how I could be accused of violating the use of my frank or being a party to the violation of my franking privilege. Every one of these envelopes [indicating the same] contains my frank up in the corner. Therefore when they were sent out to the different States of the Union, if they were not delivered to the parties addressed, they came back to me. I have here about 20 that came back within the last few days, from probably 15 or 18 different States. My secretary has opened probably 300 of those returned, and without a single exception there was nothing found in them except this minority report.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand what is the charge against the gentleman. I have not seen the newspaper article.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The charge is headed, "Abuse of the franking privilege." Mr. Libby is accused of sending his literature out in my franked envelopes.

Mr. SNELL. Do you claim it was not done?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am asserting that I took every possible safeguard and gave instructions to the House folding room to seal all of them before they went into the hands of any other person. Therefore it is hardly possible that these extra insertions were made.

Mr. SNELL. They have not been put in, so far as you know?

Mr. McCLINTIC. No. I am advised that the organization which it is said put in extraneous matters did mail out seven days after my speeches were mailed certain literature in separate stamped envelopes, and so, Mr. Speaker, it seems that someone has deliberately collected certain pamphlets mailed by this organization and then taken one of my envelopes and its contents down to the Post Office Department and asked, "Does this violate the franking privilege?"

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. McCLINTIC. In a second.

Of course, the Post Office Department would say, if you brought down one of those minority reports and a lot of appeals for money and other extraneous matter that were inclosed in the same envelope, that it did violate the franking privilege. But it seems to me that, having had five or six hundred of these envelopes returned from almost every State in the Union, certainly some of the returned envelopes would have contained the extra pamphlets if they had been included by this organization.

Mr. SNELL. Could these envelopes have been opened after they were mailed?

Mr. McCLINTIC. They could not without going to a lot of extra trouble.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the newspaper article state the name of anyone who makes the charge?

Mr. McCLINTIC. No. I was advised by a member of the press that one of my colleagues on the Naval Committee had given out this statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did you ask that newspaper man the name of the Member?

Mr. McCLINTIC. The newspaper man is one well known to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did he give you the name of the member of the committee who made that statement?

Mr. McCLINTIC. He did not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did the gentleman make an inquiry of the Post Office Department or at the substation as to who had violated the privilege?

Mr. McCLINTIC. No. I am asking that an investigation be made by some committee of Congress, and that every witness coming before that committee be put under oath, and thus establish a proper precedent in cases of this kind.

As I view this whole plan and the secrecy with which the statement has been given out, it seems that there is an element of rottenness in this alleged violation. I can not help from having a suspicion that there is a "nigger in the woodpile." Everyone knows that we have had a lot of controversy over the subject of the naval shipbuilding program; everyone knows that the church people and the different religious organizations have taken a leading part in opposing this bill for the reason it was a monstrosity, unwarranted by any situation that exists in the world at the present time with respect to war, and I opposed the same on the grounds that it was unscientific and would bring about a deliberate waste of a lot of money which should be expended for other purposes. In other words, there is going on in this country a terrific struggle between the militarists and capitalists, who would profit by such a program, and those who are affiliated with the different religious organizations who believe in peace and who follow the Biblical injunction—

Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall see God.

I want to say to this House that the salvation of the world depends upon education and religion. Religion did more to soothe the savage breast of the aborigines than all the other influences together, and if a student of history will go back to the Dark Ages in Europe he will find that the Christianizing of the barbarians was the movement that did more to lift them out of a bad condition than anything else. He will also find that the missionaries did more to inspire confidence in the aborigines of this country than all of the military organizations.

Therefore I am going to lend my influence always to those who proceed upon the theory that kindness and brotherly love will do more to soothe the feelings of a discordant element than any other thing that can be brought about. What is the situation with respect to this controversy? All of the naval activities have been put forth to mold sentiment in favor of this shipbuilding bill. The Secretary of the Navy has been making speeches throughout the Nation; the Assistant Secretary of the Navy has been out damning the churches, the newspapers, and every other element that has been opposed to war. Last week the columns of the United States Daily for three days carried articles from Secretary Wilbur with respect to war and the superiority of the battleship over all other types of ships. In other words, the Secretary of the Navy is the mouthpiece for a lot of ancient antiquarians who try to stress the superiority of 24-inch guns over an airplane that will carry a projectile for a thousand miles. Thus it can be seen that everything on earth is being done to mislead the people and destroy those who have the courage and honesty to fight against such a program, and I am not surprised that a charge of this kind is being made against the use of my frank. Why did those interested in this subject wait 30 days to make this charge? How easy it is to collect some of the literature that has been sent out by the Council for the Prevention of War and then tear open one of my envelopes, slip it in, and then take it down to the Post Office Department and say, "See here what McCLINTIC is allowing to be mailed out under one of his franks!"

Let us have a full investigation of this matter. I want to be confronted with those who have made this accusation. I have nothing to cover up, and I want the truth always to prevail.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I have taken the position that the naval construction bill was a monstrosity; that it would bring about the expenditure of a lot of money without providing the kind of implements of war that were needed in an emergency. Therefore this element that seems to be opposing those who would have peace, as evidenced by their attitude before the committee, is now trying to reach out a little bit further and strike below the belt in an alleged charge which I do not believe to be true.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Has the gentleman asked the National Council for Prevention of War if they have done that?

Mr. McCLINTIC. They said they had mailed out appeals for money and that they were sent out seven days after I had mailed the minority report. Therefore I say it would be a physical impossibility for these envelopes to contain that extraneous matter.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Did they say they had sent them out under your envelopes?

Mr. McCLINTIC. No; they did not.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. Does the gentleman who is alleged to have sent out this extraneous matter emphatically deny that he sent anything of that sort in your franked envelopes?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. Did he mail out any of the gentleman's minority report?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. But the gentleman says those envelopes were sealed before he received them?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes; they were sealed in the folding room by Government authorities.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Oklahoma ought to feel highly gratified, because they never hit at anybody unless he is doing something for the country.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Well, I want to say that the way I view this subject is that every man is charged with a certain amount of responsibility, that he ought to be conscientious in the performance of his duties and ought to believe what he says.

Mr. BLANTON. And the fact that they are shooting at the gentleman shows he is doing splendid work for his constituents.

Mr. McCLINTIC. That is very nice of the gentleman. I just want to say that no Member of Congress ought to be charged with any kind of a frame-up like this. These envelopes which I brought here with me were never opened until this morning, and they have been opened in your presence by one of the employees. Here they are. They are from about 15 or 18 States and were taken from some 500 that have been returned to me. Not a single extraneous statement has been found in any of the envelopes, and therefore I brand this as a frame-up of the rankest kind.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman asks that an investigation be made. As I understand, the precedent is that when a charge is made that a Member's frank has been improperly used he should make a complaint to the Post Office Department, and that department has all of the machinery necessary to make a proper investigation. So is not that the proper place in which to lodge the gentleman's complaint, rather than to have an investigation made here?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I will say to the gentleman that I have no desire to impose upon this Congress any useless machinery, and I prefer to have the investigation made in the regular way. I did not even care to take the time of the House by presenting a question of personal privilege, but I believe every Member of Congress is interested in a fair and square deal, and when any such implication as is contained in these charges is made I believe it is the duty of a Member to come out in the open and not hide himself. I believe he should not be afraid to come out and look any man in the eye. I resent any attempt of this kind to charge that a Member is not performing his duty, and I resent any such unjust charges being made, and I for one desire to have the charges proved or disproved.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. If the gentleman is satisfied that some one has done this, does he not think it is his duty to the rest of the Members of Congress to find out who the man is and let the rest of us know, so we can guard ourselves against him?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion, and I believe that before night we shall know who it is that made this charge. I ask for the fullest investigation, having in mind that when this is brought to light no man will swear that he has opened envelopes containing this minority report and other matter that is not properly frankable.

RESOLUTION OF THE MISSISSIPPI LEGISLATURE

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute in order to present resolutions from my State legislature.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, there are in the South many miles of valuable lands which can be reclaimed and turned to effective use in agriculture. We think that can be done for less money than it has cost to reclaim the arid lands of the West. And when thus reclaimed these southern lands would be quite equal to the western lands. There has been a bill introduced to that effect in the Senate by Senator McKELLAR, of Tennessee, and a bill in the House by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. I hold in my hand resolutions which have been passed by the legislature of my State favoring the passage of those bills. The resolutions are sent to me by the secretary of state of the State of Mississippi, and I ask permission to extend my remarks by printing the resolutions in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The resolution follows:

A concurrent resolution indorsing the reclamation program of the Department of the Interior (the home-making department of our Government) for the establishment of rural communities in Mississippi and other Southern States and memorializing Congress to give its support to the measure and commending the Mississippi State Board of Development for its activities in connection with the program

Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior (the home-making department of our Government), has proposed a very definite and practical plan for assisting southern agriculture by the establishment of a colony in each Southern State of 200 farms or more, to be sold to selected farmers in the South and other States on convenient terms; and

Whereas these colonies will be under the supervision of experts who will provide the plan for production and marketing of farm products; and

Whereas the successful agricultural districts of the world have been based upon such community units, which have resulted in home ownership, the most urgent requirement of the Nation; and

Whereas the public domain of the United States adapted to present-day remunerative economic use is practically exhausted; and

Whereas the vast areas resulting from timber operations in the Southern States because of their proximity to our great consuming centers and to our ports are worthy of immediate serious attention with respect to present beneficial use and ultimate settlement and development; and

Whereas practically all efforts at so-called colonization have been in large measure unsuccessful and neither lasting nor permanent, and because of their too intensely commercial aspect have largely resulted in a loss of public confidence, and have often brought their promoters into national disrepute; and

Whereas the problem of home making is one of national importance and should command the assistance, support, and best thought of all agencies: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi that the opportunity for reestablishing southern agricultural life upon a sound basis presents itself in the plans proposed by the Department of the Interior and that the reclamation policies be extended to include the South and not restricted to other parts of the country; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent each Congressman and Senator from Mississippi urging their vigorous support of Senate bill No. 2015, introduced by Senator McKELLAR, of Tennessee, and of House bill 8221, introduced by Representative CRISP, of Georgia; and be it further

Resolved, That we commend the efforts of the Mississippi State Board of Development which have resulted in the selection of a site in Mississippi for the location of one of the proposed colonies, and that the board be urged to continue its aggressive efforts to bring about the early adoption of the program now before Congress.

I, Walker Wood, secretary of state of the State of Mississippi, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution 19, acts of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi of 1928, as shown by the enrolled act thereof on file in my said office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Mississippi this 12th day of April, 1928.

[SEAL.] WALKER WOOD,
Secretary of State.

UNIVERSAL DRAFT LAW

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the distinguished chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation [Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota] made a very able address on the floor of the House in which he appealed for the passage of the Capper-Johnson bill, known as the universal draft law.

Considerable criticism has been directed toward the gentleman from South Dakota because he sought to enforce a drastic rule by securing a sufficient number of signatures from Members of the House to force this measure out of the Military Affairs Committee, where it appears to be peacefully sleeping.

Being a new Member of Congress, it is not mine to say whether or not the chairman of the Veterans' Committee employed the correct method of procedure, but his drastic action has called the attention of this House and the country to the fact that another Congress will likely soon adjourn without passing the universal draft law, which would draft money, materials, industry, and labor, as well as men, in case of future wars.

It is not my purpose to apologize for America's part in the World War. And I drew no such inference from my distinguished colleague's able address, as some of you gentlemen seem to have done. There never has been a doubt in my mind that the war with Germany was inevitable. Entering that terrible death struggle, as America did, woefully unprepared, our country finished the job much more quickly than the most optimistic had dreamed it could be done. But that is not the issue here. That has nothing to do with the merits of this measure, which has been pending in Congress for the past six years and which, if passed, would be a great forward step in outlawing war.

Nor have I any criticism of the draft law Congress passed 11 years ago, except that it did not go far enough. It did not even attempt to outlaw unconscionable profiteering, as has been the case in every war in which America has participated. There is no escape from the fact that during that last awful conflict, while our boys were "carrying on over there," and every loyal American at home was saving and sacrificing in a heroic manner, the moneyed oligarchy was plying its evil and dastardly trade. Bold and flagrant profiteering ran rampant in our land.

We saw 4,000 new millionaires made almost overnight. We saw sugar kings buy Cuban sugar at 6½ cents per pound and force the American public to pay 25 and 30 cents for it. We saw coal barons triple the price of coal within a few weeks, while we were in that desperate death struggle. We saw the sorry spectacle of munition makers harvesting millions, while your sons, who faced the machine-gun bullets they made, received $1 a day. We witnessed much pillage and graft during those dark days, and this Government was helpless, as our people groaned under a heavy tax. Some concerns, especially those having Government contracts, boldly admitted they made 150 per cent profits. Investigations which followed disclosed not a few made profits as high as 700 per cent.

Concerns having Government contracts to make soldier's uniforms, overcoats, overshoes, and raincoats profiteered in a brazen and shameful fashion. Several Members of this House wore those so-called raincoats made by profiteers, as did the other boys on the rain-soaked battle fields of France. And well do you recall that the raincoats you were forced to wear resembled a mosquito bar more than a raincoat. Investigations disclosed that the heartless, unpatriotic plunderers who secured the contract to make 1,000,000 raincoats for the Government purchased a sufficient amount of india rubber to make that number according to specifications. Later they received orders for 7,000,000 coats, so those conscienceless profiteers stretched this rubber purchased for only 1,000,000 garments to cover the entire number of 7,000,000 raincoats. No small per cent of the 60,000 brave men who were buried on European soil died of exposure and cold attributed directly to war profiteering in worthless raincoats, overcoats, and overshoes which our soldiers were forced to wear.

Another class of profiteers the generation which bore the brunt of the war will not soon forget are some of those much-advertised, alleged heroes who offered their valuable services to the Government at $1 per year. Some of those distinguished gentlemen who are to-day numbered among the world's wealthiest men were pictured as great, self-sacrificing citizens then. But this generation still remembers and resents the acts of those self-confessed war heroes extensively advertised as having offered their valuable services to our Government for only $1 per year. It was later learned that many of them were dealing in Government contracts, whereby they robbed our Government of millions. With their right hand they accepted a pittance from the Government, but with their left hand they were reaching back and pillaging people of millions in war profits.

The farmers and small business men did not ask nor expect such enormous profits. The farmers furnished a large per cent of the finest boys for the World War who ever wore uniforms, and then paid more than their share for that war. [Applause.] Although the farmer was forced to pay $10 per day for labor, 25 to 30 cents a pound for sugar, if he got any, and ordered not to eat white bread, the price was set on his grain which reduced the market price 30 cents per bushel on the farmer's wheat.

Nor have some of us forgotten those awful, heart-breaking hours when our recruits were loaded in like cattle and rushed to training camps. The soldier laborers and soldier carpenters at camps received their $1 per day, while the civilian who was physically unfit, working side by side with the soldier, received $10 per day and more. The young man who happened to have only one eye, or who was otherwise incapacitated for military service, was recognized as being worth ten times that of the man in uniform. The law we are to-day advocating, if passed, would mean that never again can such injustices obtain in this land of the free.

We see our soldiers as they are jerked from the training camps before learning to load a rifle, and started for Hoboken, where they find the shipbuilders and other less hazardous jobs paying civilians $10 to $20 per day. We see our lads as they "go down to the sea in ships" and cross the treacherous, darkened ocean, where the enemy submarines lie in wait to drag them down to death without giving them a fighting chance. We see them landing on a foreign soil and listening to tongues unknown to them.

We see our Americans rushed to the rescue of the Allies, who were not only heartsick but terror stricken, and whose lines were cracking and breaking before the onslaught of the hitherto unconquerable enemy. We see them at Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, at St. Etienne, and in the Argonne Forest. Many of you had a map on the wall at home, and as you eagerly read your morning paper you stuck a pin in the map showing exactly how far the Americans had advanced. May I remind you that not one time after our boys took over any salient was it ever necessary for you to place that pin backward. [Applause.]

Then came the glad tidings of peace. The Thirty-sixth Division, the outfit I served in, had relieved the marines on the front and had suffered a loss of nearly 3,000 men killed and wounded. After receiving reinforcements the Thirty-sixth Division had moved over to the little shell-torn village of Treacourt, near Verdun, awaiting orders to go back once again into that black wave of death and destruction. On that fateful November 11 I saw those men rise up out of the mud and filth and cry for joy that the war was over. "Finis la guerre" was on the lips of the few peasants left in that village. "The war is over," resounded around the world. Those men who rose out of the mud that day purposed in their hearts that never again should war be waged if such could possibly be averted. These same men fervently believe this pending measure the logical and practical way of maintaining peace. The question I desire to ask is, Shall we keep faith with our men who took part in that memorable struggle, including "those who sleep where poppies grow"?

The American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and many other organizations have all gone on record many times since the close of that conflict in favor of a universal draft act, proposing to conscript all of our Nation's resources in case of war. Members of the Legion who have caught the torch of their fallen comrades and who are still carrying on contend and are insisting, Mr. Speaker, that money and materials are no more sacred than the young manhood of America.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, may I say here that I am not a recent convert to the soundness of the pending measure. Many years ago, as a member of the State Senate of Oklahoma, I sponsored a resolution urging the Congress to pass the universal draft act, a resolution which was adopted by a unanimous vote of our legislature. I have advocated this measure in my campaigns, believing it to be of great, vital importance to the peace and security of mankind.

May I remind my Republican friends in this connection that your last national convention pledged your party to support this measure? The Democratic National Convention, as well as the recent State convention of the party in Oklahoma, likewise indorsed the universal draft law, and I do not hesitate to say that had the Democrats been in power these years and failed and refused to pass this much-needed legislation, I would not hesitate to condemn my party for its failure to keep its promises to the people.

This measure has been pending since 1922, and the only excuse—a pitiful one, offered on this floor the other day—for the failure of the committee to bring out this bill is that it will require additional hearings. It required no hearings to place this in the platforms of both parties, but now you quibble about committee hearings. I hold in my hand one volume of 250 pages of hearings. This measure has been discussed in Congress and on the stump for six years. Unless action is taken before the Seventieth Congress adjourns, I am of the opinion there will be "hearings" from the people aplenty. And those leaders responsible for all this delay and inaction are going to hear; the people will speak in a plain and unmistakable way.

If peace is to be maintained in this great land of ours we must take the profits out of war. We must eliminate the blighting effects of the damnable profiteers who have amassed great fortunes out of war. We must make it plain to our people and the world that property is no more sacred to America than human lives. We must conscript every available resource in this country in case of armed conflict. That will do far more, Mr. Speaker, toward perpetuating the peace of the world than all the peace conferences held in the past decade. Let us eliminate the profits of war, and then, when the other nations follow our example, peace will breathe as fragrantly in the world almost as if the day of redemption had come. [Applause.]

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12875) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12875, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he will return at this time to the two items in the bill that were passed over yesterday upon my request. I do this because it is almost imperative that I be absent from the Chamber later in the afternoon, and I would rather take the matters up now than later.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, replying to the gentleman, I would say that ordinarily I would absolutely refuse to do so, but under the circumstances, and especially in view of conditions in my colleague's home, I feel rather constrained to comply with his request and return to the item at this time. If the situation were otherwise, I certainly would not consent at this time, because it was a matter of courtesy to the gentleman that unanimous consent was asked that these items be passed over. I hope I may have the permission of the rest of the committee in granting this request.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say that it is with a great deal of regret I consent to returning to these items, because I feel we ought to go on now, if we are to finish the bill to-day, and then turn back to these items after we have concluded the reading of the bill. This would be the orderly way of doing it. If we start in on these matters now, I do not know whether we will get through with the bill to-day or not.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It will only take two minutes.

Mr. MURPHY. I have no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am not objecting.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we now return to the two items that by unanimous consent were passed over on yesterday, the first one being the item at line 1, page 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to page 15, line 1. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF SERGEANT AT ARMS

Salaries: Sergeant at Arms, $6,500; Deputy Sergeant at Arms, $2,880; cashier, $4,500; assistant cashier, $2,500; two bookkeepers, at $3,000 each; Deputy Sergeant at Arms in charge of pairs, $2,500; pair clerk and messenger, $2,500; temporary stenographic services, $600; skilled laborer, $1,140; hire for automobiles, $660; in all, $29,720.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order with reference to this paragraph that it is legislation on an appropriation bill, and therefore should be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman deem the entire paragraph subject to a point of order?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I reserve a point of order.

Under the reservation I wish to say that this item increases certain salaries in the office of the Sergeant at Arms and also abolishes a position in that department.

These matters were taken care of in a resolution introduced earlier in the session, which has not as yet been acted upon. I feel from the study by a special committee which has been given to the question of the entire personnel of the House employees in the Capitol and House Office Building there should be no discrimination. They should all be treated alike. If we are going to raise any salaries, we should raise them all, and if we are not going to raise those who are the poorest paid, those who are getting less than $1,200 a year, I am opposed to playing any favorites, and consequently I very regretfully make this point of order and expect a little later on to introduce a comprehensive, scientific rearrangement of all of these employees and their salaries. I will then leave it to the House to decide whether they think they should be treated as a group or whether we shall make exceptions in certain cases.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman reserves his point of order?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I reserve the point of order to hear any statement that the gentleman from Ohio may desire to make.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman indicate whether or not in his opinion the other resolution, to which he has referred, is liable to be reported soon?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, many of you were not here the other day when I attempted in 10 minutes to explain this bill to you. This is a housekeeping bill, having to do with the activities of the House.

The employees that are handled in this bill and whose fortunes are tied up in this bill do not come under the reclassification act. They have no hope of an annuity at any time in their lives or when they retire from service. They have nothing in this way to look forward to in any way, shape, or form.

There has been no committee of this House charged with the responsibility of legislating at any time for the entire personnel of the legislative establishment. The gentleman who is making the point of order was appointed, I think—or thought he was, at least—a committee to investigate and rearrange the positions in the legislative establishment of the Government.

The particular matter to which the gentleman is objecting does not have a very good and substantial background. Taking his own scientific measure as a basis, we find his bill only touches one salary that we have here attempted to raise, and that is the salary of the assistant cashier.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield right there? The gentleman is entirely mistaken. It affects the personnel of all except the cashier. The resolution to which he refers increases the salary of the assistant cashier. It creates a new office in giving him an assistant and it promotes the laborer to messenger, and increases his salary, and all of these officials have to handle large sums of money, have to be bonded and pay for their own bond. It does not increase the salary of the cashier, but other than that it affects the personnel of several employees in the Sergeant at Arms' office.

Mr. MURPHY. I will say for the benefit of the House that the general resolution did not touch the cashier. The resolution does not raise the present messenger to assistant cashier. In our bill we are attempting to give him the designation of assistant cashier and to raise his salary to $2,500 a year. As the gentleman well knows the assistant cashier, now known as the messenger takes his turn in the cage with the cashier and handles between four and five million dollars a year. This messenger must pay for his own bond out of the salary he receives which is $1,720.

The Sergeant at Arms made such a good case before the committee that it was the unanimous opinion of those who heard the testimony that something should be done in rearranging the title of those who served in this office. I say this is legislation, gentlemen of the committee, but there is no other committee that is charged with the responsibility of legislating for this House and for the Senate—for the legislative establishment. The gentleman's committee went into session and labored some weeks preparing a resolution of some kind that only touches those particular activities in one place and raises the salary of this man from $1,720 to $2,100——

Mr. DYER. This is the only chance of giving this man a raise in salary at this session, is it not?

Mr. MURPHY. The only chance.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield? I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts announced that he has prepared a bill in reference to this matter, and I wonder what he has been holding it back for.

Mr. MURPHY. I presume the gentleman from Massachusetts can tell the gentleman why.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I think it is pretty clear from the debate on that side of the House that we will have to wait until the Democrats come into possession of the House, when the matter will be remedied.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Oh, no; I was only talking to the other side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think I can clarify the situation. The gentleman from Massachusetts has no quarrel or difference of opinion with the committee in the raising of salaries. They are justified. I will say also that the committee, which was duly authorized by unanimous vote of this House, labored four months on this situation and made a complete and exhaustive investigation. The question is whether you are going to take a few who are deserving, and who evidently are favored, raise them and ignore all the rest.

I want a chance to stand on this floor and defend the work which I performed for over four months in the vacation period, an opportunity to do an act of justice, and also an opportunity of getting rid, if you please, Mr. Chairman, of some very unnecessary incumbents who are drawing salaries and doing no work.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply interested in what the gentleman says. I think the gentleman ought to be a little broader gauged to-day; I think he ought not to allow the pride of authorship to step in the way and interfere with these men receiving what is fair in the way of compensation for that which they do for the safety of the Government for the work which they perform in the Sergeant at Arms' office.

This committee has nothing to do with reallocating these positions, and we are not attempting to do that. This is a housekeeping matter. This is a matter that comes before the committee, and we seek to do justice. We look after the legislation necessary to protect and take care of these employees that we have attempted to do something for in this bill. The total increase in the Sergeant at Arms' office, if the salaries are rearranged, is only $600, a mere bagatelle. I do hope the gentleman from Massachusetts simply because of pride of authorship will not step in the way by making a point of order.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman from Massachusetts has no pride of authorship at all. It is the only way the gentleman can get a hearing, and so the gentleman from Massachusetts is taking an attitude which may not meet with the approval of the House, but it is in his own defense.

If the gentleman was going to clean house in this department, why did he not authorize the absolute elimination of the office of Assistant Sergeant at Arms? The only duty of that office consists of a man bringing the mace up from downstairs and putting it in the block, then going off into the corridor and having an easy time until the mace has to be taken down again and brought downstairs—a duty which has been performed by one of the pair clerks throughout this whole session and which was neglected to such an extent in the last session that the Assistant Sergeant at Arms at the close of the session went off and left the mace in the block and left us in session here all summer long! [Laughter.] Why did not the gentleman clean house while he was about it?

I am sure there would have been no objection from the gentleman from Massachusetts, and there would have been no increase in the amount of money expended. To make it absolutely clear, the gentleman from Massachusetts has tried to get this matter before the House. He has failed to get it before the House. By making the point of order at this time the gentleman from Massachusetts believes that he can eventually get his resolution before the House and can do it only in that way. Consequently, he is taking advantage of the situation.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I assure the gentleman and the Members of the House that it has not been the province or the desire in any way, shape, or form of this committee to go into general legislation of any kind. These little things that we have picked up in this bill seemed to be essential. They seemed to be necessary. I am surprised that the gentleman from Massachusetts criticizes an office held in this House from time immemorial, an office created by law. If, perchance, the person who filled that office might forget the mace and leave it standing on its pedestal, surely no injury has been done to this legislative establishment. But that has nothing whatever to do with this matter. This committee comes before the House, frankly, openly, stating to you that this is your home, this is your establishment, and that you are legislating here for those who serve you. It is up to you to take care of this matter, if you choose to do so, and I say to my friend from Massachusetts that I think, in view of the sentiment of the day, in view of the sentiment that prompted this committee to give to the gentleman an opportunity to come before the House at this time, he ought to think of these men who are worthy of what they are allowed by this bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. They will get it under my resolution, every one of them.

Mr. MURPHY. But the gentleman's resolution is not before the House.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I hope it will be.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Why does not the gentleman from Massachusetts submit it to the House in the form of an amendment at this time and take his chances before this Committee of the Whole?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I am willing; give me a chance. That is all I ask for.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. But the gentleman makes the point of order and wants to strike it out.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have reserved the point of order.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Why not withdraw your point of order and offer your amendment and let the Committee of the Whole strike it out?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I can not do that, because my resolution embraces more than this one office. It involves every committeeship, every clerk, and every assistant clerk of a committee.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Offer it as far as the Sergeant at Arms' office is concerned.

Mr. UNDERHILL. My resolution increases the salary of 153 employees of this House.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman will agree that this committee is not attempting any reorganization of the House.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, of course it is not.

Mr. MURPHY. But the gentleman will have to agree and tell the House that he is holding up this legislation on this bill simply because he wants to force a reorganization of the legislative establishment so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, and he wants to do it in his way.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is the interpretation of the gentleman. I plead guilty.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, you can see what we have tried to do. The responsibility is yours, because we can not help ourselves under the rule if the gentleman from Massachusetts insists upon the point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts has made up his mind to make this point of order, and your committee which has attempted to do something to help along orderly housekeeping in this establishment is absolutely helpless at this time. We have to submit to any point of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts makes. You have listened to the gentleman and have found out the motivating influence behind his action.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has reserved the point of order. Under that reservation there has been two recognitions. The gentleman from Massachusetts was recognized first, and the gentleman from Ohio next.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, in order that the House may know the motive which actuates me in reserving this point of order, I want to go back a little way, returning to the last session of the House. At that time the House unanimously, under the recommendation of the Committee on Rules, referred to a special committee this question of readjustment and realignment of salaries and of positions. I stayed here for two months after the other Members went home, worked with the other members of that special committee, and interviewed the head of every department, took their recommendations and wrote them into a prospective bill.

I returned here on the 1st of October and I worked every day with the other members of the committee. We went into every nook and cranny of this part of the Capitol and of the House Office Building.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; I want to tell the story. It is the only chance I have had.

I spent over a thousand dollars for hotel accommodations here in Washington when I had a perfectly good home in Massachusetts. I spent four months of time. I had no friends to reward and no enemies to punish, and I doubt if, outside of a few men on the floor of the House with whom I come in daily contact, I knew a single employee.

We took the committees and we classified them, and we raised the salaries of assistant clerks and of janitors and such other employees as were poorly paid employees of Uncle Sam, getting $900 a year and working not only while the House was in session but 365 days in the year. We raised those poorly paid employees. We tried to equalize the pay of the expert clerks in the Ways and Means, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and in the Judiciary Committees to somewhere near the amounts which had been raised previously in an appropriation bill to the clerks and employees of the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, when that bill was presented to the House it was so scientific that the employees could not understand it.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I want to raise a point of order. Is the gentleman talking to the point of order that he raised?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asked unanimous consent to address the committee.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR] tried to get the bill up. It was misunderstood, because we wrote into the bill, in the first place, that such and such offices should be abandoned. For instance, we took the barbers and we wiped the barbers who were down as "cloakroom employees" off the slate; but later on, three or four pages later, we reinstated them as "attendants." In other words, we did not try to delude the public into thinking that these men were cloakroom employees, when they were barbers, but we put them on the roll as attendants. The barbers, however, thought that they had been kicked out and they, with others equally mistaken, got a lobby to oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, may I proceed for five minutes more?

Mr. KING. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. SNELL. On this subject.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. SNELL. I will yield at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, there was an almost unanimous opinion among the Members of the House who talked with me on this subject that there was actual need of a reorganization of the employees of this House. The matter was given considerable attention at the last session of Congress, and the Committee on Rules took it up, and a resolution was offered on the floor of the House to create a special committee to take into consideration this subject and bring about a reorganization of employees and adjust the pay of the men who do this work. That resolution received a unanimous report, I believe.

I know that the members of that special committee spent a great deal of time in making the investigation. I think they prepared a good report. It may not be absolutely perfect, but generally they equalized the pay of people doing the same class of work; raised the pay in some cases, and in others abolished the positions. They did the whole thing from an absolutely impartial standpoint. They did exactly what the members asked them to do, and exactly what ought to be done to procure efficient service. Now, as far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, I personally went before that committee a year ago and asked them to adjust the pay of one of the clerks of my committee. They said they had no right to do it because it was not authorized by law. I accepted their statement on that ground, because I thought they were correct, and I do not think that is the way to do it, and we started it right when we created this committee to do it. And I want to say to the House that the work of the special committee of the Committee on Accounts was well done. The measure which they brought in ought to be brought up on the floor of this House and be presented and discussed and disposed of. It is entitled to full consideration; if the House approves, adopt it; if they do not, reject it. I want to see how many Members want to vote to keep a position where the occupant has nothing to do.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. In a moment. The only reason why there was opposition to that report was that, first, the Members did not understand it; and, second, it did away with certain positions where no service was performed. I am in favor of doing away with those positions, and am willing to go on record to that effect.

Mr. KING. If such thorough work was done in this house-cleaning proposition as is stated to have been done, why did they retain 30 employees in the kitchen in the restaurant downstairs when there is not 30 square feet of space down there for them to stay in?

Mr. SNELL. I can not answer that, but I expect the committee can.

Mr. UNDERHILL. What does the gentleman say?

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman know why they have not investigated the kitchen? There are so many dishwashers down there that they can not operate.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Has the gentleman ever been down in the kitchen?

Mr. KING. No. You have a lot of men cleaning silver down there, and they are on the pay roll. Certainly, we should have the silver cleaned.

Mr. SNELL. I am in favor of the special committee's report, and if there is any need of cleaning up the kitchen I am in favor of having it cleaned up, and expect to keep the number of men necessary to do the work.

Mr. KING. You have them on the pay roll.

Mr. UNDERHILL. You and your wife come in there and demand service, and you get it.

Mr. KING. And we pay for it, too.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will we have this special resolution mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] brought in under a special rule, or will it be brought in so that it will be open for amendment?

Mr. SNELL. I am in favor of bringing it in and fully discussing it, and if there is anything in it that is not right, it can be pointed out and corrected, but after the work that has been done by the committee, its work should be considered by the House and disposed of or forever afterwards not find fault on account of poor service and inequality of pay among the employees.

Mr. SCHAFER. Another short question to clear up the RECORD. The floor leader on the Democratic side indicated that they will have to wait until the Democratic Party comes into power before they can end the discrimination in salaries. I wish to state that this discrimination has existed for many years, including the time the Democratic Party was in power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURPHY: Page 15, line 1, insert:

"OFFICE OF SERGEANT AT ARMS

"Salaries: Sergeant at Arms, $6,500; Deputy Sergeant at Arms, $2,880; cashier, $4,000; two bookkeepers, at $3,000 each; Deputy Sergeant at Arms in charge of pairs, $2,500; pair clerk and messenger, $2,500; messenger, $1,730; stenographer and typewriter, $1,200; skilled laborer, $1,140; hire for automobiles, $600; in all, $29,050."

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to strike out the last word, and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I do this for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to what I consider to be unfair at this time to a very faithful employee of this House. He has had a stroke of paralysis and he has nobody here to say a good word in his behalf. I refer to the man who has been bringing in the mace for 10 years, Mr. Jordan. He is now in a very desperate situation. He does not belong to my party. He belongs to the opposite party; he is not a special friend of mine, but I hardly think it is fair, when a faithful employee of this House year in and year out for 10 years has been serving us faithfully, when he is old and has had a stroke of paralysis, to haggle about continuing his position. Therefore, I certainly hope that when we bring this matter up for consideration—and I am appealing now to the chairman of the Rules Committee, and also to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL]—we will remember the services of this man. I think the House ought to know about him. As you know, we have not seen him here during the session. You know there has been some talk about his going off, leaving the mace and leaving us in session all summer. I think we are doing a very grave injustice to a mighty good old man.

Mr. SANDLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. SANDLIN. The gentleman says he is paralyzed?

Mr. ABERNETHY. He has been paralyzed, so I am informed by one of the gentlemen here.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. He was one of the most loyal Republicans from the State of Kansas that the G. O. P. ever had among the employees of the House.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I do not care about his politics.

Mr. BLANTON. He rendered loyal and efficient service to this House day in and day out, and at night when we were in session, and he worked for the Republican Party faithfully on every single issue they ever had. I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina in everything he says about him.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. May I say that the gentleman is confusing the recommendation and my remarks. I was not referring to Mr. Jordan, but I was referring to the job.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Well, I think the job has merit to it. I think it is one of the things which adds dignity to the House. Sometimes, you know, we get obstreperous in this Chamber, and it may become necessary to call the Assistant Sergeant at Arms into action, and, as I understand, when he takes that mace and puts it down in front of you, you had better behave yourself or you may leave the House. That is my understanding of the rules.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. If we followed the arguments made in favor of abolishing the position to their ultimate conclusion, we could safely abolish many police forces which are maintained to enforce law and order.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The thing about it is this old man has nobody to speak for him. He always impressed me as being a fine citizen and a fine employee of this House, and I thought it well to bring this matter to the attention of the Members at this time so that when this question comes up we may reward faithful service, whether it be rendered by a Republican or a Democrat. We should remember the services of any man who serves us as faithfully as old man Jordan, and when he becomes sick I do not feel we should just kick him out. That is the way I feel about it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If by any chance Al Smith should sweep in a Democratic majority, would you keep him on?

Mr. ABERNETHY. We might. There is no telling what we would do, but I know we would not kick him out if he served us faithfully for 10 years.

Mr. EDWARDS. We kept the Chaplain in office here.

Mr. ABERNETHY. There is not so much politics in this body after all, to be perfectly candid with you. We exchange views; but I will admit there are some very good men on that side of the House. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. Of course, there is not very much politics in the House because the Democratic Party has not taken up any issue. They practically follow the Republican Party on every issue that comes up. The only issue they have to go to the polls on is the tariff issue.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I will ask the gentleman, in return, who is the gentleman's leader—LA FOLLETTE or NICK LONGWORTH? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say to the gentleman I do not follow any leader. I believe a Representative should represent his constituents and not follow the dictates of any leader, be he conservative, so called, or progressive.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Then why have any leaders or why talk about leaders?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Wisconsin is the distinguished leader of a party of one Member here. [Laughter.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. The gentleman is a pretty good fellow, just the same.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Wisconsin would rather be the leader of a party of one Member and properly represent the views of the great majority of several hundred thousand constituents than to disregard their views in a legislative body and follow the crack of the whip of any political leader.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I did not get up here to bring any issue against the gentleman from Wisconsin. I only got up here to speak for a man who is sick. The gentleman is not sick, is he? [Laughter.]

Mr. EDWARDS. As I understand it, the gentleman from North Carolina was talking about the unfortunate, paralyzed condition of this particular individual and was not talking of the unfortunate, paralyzed condition of the Republican Party.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Wisconsin agrees with the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina that we should not abolish this position. The gentleman from Wisconsin rose, in the first instance, to call attention to the fact that this man also acts as a sort of policeman in this House. Certain gentlemen argued that this man did not have to perform actual service every day in the year, using that as an argument to abolish the position, and I stated that on that same argument we should abolish the police force everywhere.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Then why should the gentleman jump on the Democrats just because I was trying to help out the gentleman's views? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. I was not jumping on the Democrats; but the gentleman said that politics were not played in this House, and I agreed with the gentleman and told the reason.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I want to make this statement frankly, openly, and above board, and I know it to be the fact. In many matters there are no politics and there should not be any politics. [Applause.] There are good men on both sides of the House. Of course, we have different views on different issues, but when it comes to doing what is right and what is just, in most cases you will find that the membership of this House will measure up, and I want to say in passing I was talking to a very distinguished Member of the House the other day about this question. We have 435 Members of the House and I do not know of one Member of the House who is not an honest man, I do not care what side of the House he is on—not one. I think there is too much abuse of the Members of the House. I do not know of a better body in any country or in any place than the body of men in this House, and when you measure up the men of this House you find they are honest. I do not know of a dishonest man in this House. He could not stay here if he was dishonest. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. From what the gentleman has said, I take it the gentleman would be willing to come back next fall?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am trying to come back. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman think we ought to have two aisles here instead of one, so we can take care of everybody?

Mr. ABERNETHY. No; I think this is well enough.

Mr. BUTLER. I would not have any aisles.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I think it is all right the way it is. I think parties are all right. I belong to a great party and the gentleman from Wisconsin belongs to a great party, as well as the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from New York. I did not rise for the purpose of getting into any argument or any controversy. I only rose to say a good word for an old gentleman who does not seem to have anybody here to say a good word for him. I do not know the man except from passing him here in the House day after day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Paragraph 1, page 17, line 17, was passed over without prejudice. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts wish to consider that now?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST OFFICE

Salaries: Postmaster, $4,200; assistant postmaster, $2,570; registry and money-order clerk, $2,000; assistant registry and money-order clerk, $1,800; five case distributors at $1,700 each; record and file clerk, $1,700; 27 messengers (including 1 to superintend transportation of mails), at $1,520 each; for the employment of substitute messengers, and extra services of regular employees at the rate of not to exceed $125 per month each, $1,000; laborer, $1,010; in all, $63,820.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order with reference to this paragraph that I made to the other. I will reserve it in order to give an opportunity to such of our Members as desire to pass encomiums on the splendid service we are getting and the efficiency of the postmaster, to which I agree.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this ought to be disposed of at once, and I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, line 16, insert the following:

"POST OFFICE

"Salaries: Postmaster, $4,200; assistant postmaster, $2,570; registry and money-order clerk, $1,830; 34 messengers (including 1 to superintend transportation of mails), at $1,520 each; for the employment of substitute messengers, and extra services of regular employees at the rate of not to exceed $125 per month each, $1,000; laborer, $1,010; in all, $62,290."

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, at this point I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, who made the point of order, to state to the House how many places in the post office his resolution touches, or changes in any way?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, as I recall the resolution it only affects two employees of the post office in reference to increase in salaries; but the resolution also provides, on the recommendation of one of the best post-office inspectors that we could get who spent over a week investigating, that two of the forwarding clerks be dispensed with. I have no objection whatever—I want to emphasize again—to the recommendations made by the Appropriations Committee. They are perfectly satisfactory to me, but until we can take the whole matter up I feel constrained to raise the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman from Ohio knows, because he has investigated the matter, if our efficient Postmaster Collier were not working for the House of Representatives but in the regular service he would receive $600 more than we pay him. And yet my friend from Massachusetts sought to take two of his needed employees away from him. I have been here 12 years, and I have never seen Mr. Collier lobbying on the floor of the House or in the lobby—not once. If you want to find Mr. Collier go to the post office any time in business hours and you will find him there industriously working for the 435 Members of Congress. There is no politics about him, only a loyal, faithful employee of the Government.

Mr. SCHAFER. I heartily concur in the statement made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I know I am not wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Twenty years ago, when the mail handled by the post-office department of the House was very much less than at present, the salary of the House Postmaster was $4,000. I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts, who I know is conscientious and diligent in matters under the jurisdiction of his committee, will not press the point of order.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Neither the gentleman from Massachusetts nor the gentleman representing the Committee on Appropriations has increased the salary of the Postmaster.

Mr. SCHAFER. A proposal would not get very far if the gentleman raised the point of order. Perhaps some other Member of Congress is prepared to offer an amendment to increase the salary of the Postmaster of the House, who is so efficient and so conscientious. If his salary was based on postal receipts and volume of business, like the postmasters throughout the country, he would be receiving $5,600 instead of his present salary of $4,200.

Mr. SNELL. What State does the Postmaster come from?

Mr. SCHAFER. From the great State of Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] that I have gone over the report of this special committee of the Committee on Accounts with a great deal of care. I think the report is entitled to a great deal of commendation. There is a lot of merit to the reorganization that is proposed. That committee has eliminated some employees that certainly ought to be eliminated and it has increased some salaries that ought to be increased. If there are other salaries that Members think are not increased enough, the House can take care of that when the resolution comes up. I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts is right in insisting that we should consider his resolution and that the Committee on Appropriations ought not to attempt to legislate in this bill.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last night the reading had proceeded to line 16, page 22. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CAPITOL BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS

Capitol Buildings: For necessary expenditures for the Capitol Building under the jurisdiction of the Architect of the Capitol, including minor improvements, maintenance, repair, equipment, supplies, material, and appurtenances; personal and other services; cleaning and repairing works of art; purchase or exchange, maintenance, and driving of motor-propelled passenger-carrying office vehicles; and not exceeding $200 for the purchase of technical and necessary reference books and city directory; $83,535.80.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, after line 10, insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"For the purchase from the owners, the heirs of its painter, Walter L. Dean, the oil painting known as Peace, as authorized by the act approved March 3, 1927, $5,000, to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, a law has been passed by this House unanimously directing this committee to purchase this particular picture.

Mr. SCHAFER. This particular picture?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. I am going to ask the chairman whether or not he will accept that amendment.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, this dear old chairman wants this picture. I think, with the permission of my colaborers on this committee, that he ought to have this picture, and I certainly will not offer any objection. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will be glad to yield to my friend from Colorado; but first I want to say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] that this is not for me. This picture has hung in the committee room as long as I have hung there. I found it there when I came. Really it is a little older than I am. It is one of the finest pictures of America. It has a good influence in the committee.

It has removed on more than one occasion ill feeling among Members and has operated as a favorable agency in defense of the Union. It is entitled "Peace."

This House unanimously directed the committee to make the purchase of this picture, a small sum of money, owing to two women. Their parents are now dead. It is a really famous painting which has been seen by thousands throughout the country. It took a prize at the Chicago world's fair. It has been passed upon favorably by the Arts Commission. The chairman of the Committee on the Library [Mr. LUCE] will tell you that it has been passed upon favorably by his committee, which reported in favor of its purchase, and the House unanimously authorized its purchase. I know the influence it has had over the members of that committee. It is a picture of the old White Squadron, which defended our country many years ago.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. I think we ought to buy this picture, and I am willing to vote to buy it.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank you.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania gets through I would like to get a chance.

Mr. BUTLER. I am through, but I would like to add this, if I may have a moment more, that perhaps I ought not to make a personal appeal. This picture exercises an influence in the committee that I like to see. It is one of the most beautiful things to be found in the Capitol. It has been authorized; otherwise I would not have offered this amendment. Some Members of the House opposed the purchase of it when $15,000 was asked. I was one of them. I thought perhaps it ought to be bought for less money. Now the painter is dead. Two women, his daughters, survive; and inasmuch as the authority has been given, I am going to ask my friend from Colorado to vote for the purchase of this picture. Let it be disposed of one way or the other. If I had the money, I would be glad to buy it myself and give it to the Government, but I have not the money.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the situation concerning this painting. There is only one justifiable reason on earth for the House adopting this amendment, and that is the wish of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, whom every Member of this body has honored and loved for 32 years, and I will not vote against his amendment for that reason. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. I thank you.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. When this $5,000 item came up before this committee I asked the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. David Lynn, and also Mr. Charles E. Fairman, the art curator of the Capitol, a man who has just written and published a splendid work on the Art and Artists of the Capitol of the United States, which you all ought to read, to bring before the committee a complete list of all the pictures and paintings and so-called works of art and every conceivable kind that does not belong to the Government and that has been loaned to or has in some way injected or gotten into the Capitol or the House or Senate Office Buildings for the purpose of advertising the people who produce them. I wanted to learn as near as I could how many more pictures there are hanging around here whose owners are hoping Congress will some time pay a fabulous price for them. A great many artists, or self-imagined artists, have at various times tried to get their work into this building or into the House or Senate Office Buildings purely for publicity purposes.

A lot of things of that kind have been hanging around or stored in the basement and elsewhere for 30 or 40 years. Practically all of them have no present real value. They are mere junk. This picture, for example, has been, I understand, stored in the basement or hanging in some committee room for 30 or 40 years, and nobody has ever heretofore taken any action concerning it. Why under the sun should this Seventieth Congress, in 1928, wake up here now and invite people from all over to bring forward all kinds of claims against the Government and ask the Congress to pay for this junk? One of these pieces of alleged art is an enormous thing, about 10 by 14 feet, purporting to show what some man thought the North Pole looked like. I am advised it was stored in the basement for 20 or 30 years, and was then dug up and hung in our Appropriations Committee room. The owner died long ago, and I wonder if his heirs will wake up some day and want $5,000 for that. I do not like this precedent. The United States Daily, published yesterday, stated that we have authorized the payment of $35,000 for this picture. That statement goes out broadcast over the country. The fact that that paper makes it seven times worse than it is will not be corrected. All these claim agents in Washington and elsewhere will immediately prick up their ears and come before the committee presided over by the splendid gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] and clamor for legislation to authorize the purchase of these things. Everybody, or the heirs of everybody, who have got these things hanging around here will get busy. Are you going to invite all these people to come here and put in claims for $15,000 for pictures that are not worth 15 cents?

It is the principle and the precedent that I do not like. I do not like to vote to take this Peace painting away from the committee room of our splendid and kind-hearted friend. I simply want to warn the House that possibly we are going to be besieged by claims of people or descendants of people who have been dead for a generation and who may come in here and ask to be paid for pictures that we never promised to buy, and ask it simply because those pictures have been hanging up here many years, and therefore we ought to pay for them. We would be embarrassed by our action to-day. I think all these things that the Government does not own ought to be taken out and not allowed to remain in the Capitol or in either its House or Senate Office Buildings. If the owners do not want them, or if we can not find the owners, I feel that they should be disposed of some way, so the owners can not come here some time and ask Congress to pay for them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is that whole system under the control of the Architect of the Capitol or any committee as to the selection of pictures and art works?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. I can not learn that there is any system. If the chairman or some member of a committee lets somebody bring in a picture or something and hangs it up in his room, there seems to be no one to prevent it, and years after they may want us to buy it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In view of the facts brought out by the gentleman from Colorado concerning this indiscriminate system, does he not think some definite system should be adopted for the selection of pictures and sculptures to be placed in the Capitol?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, yes; of course. Nobody ought to have the right to let anybody bring in anything and leave it here indefinitely and then expect us to pay for it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What surprises me is that there has not been some system formulated which would take care of a situation of this sort.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly there should be some system, and that is the reason I am calling the attention of the House to this situation. This picture was left here long before some of these Members were born, and no one before has apparently ever thought of paying anything for it.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The Fine Arts Commission recommends the purchase of this picture, but even as good a friend as the gentleman is of mine I would not ask him to make such a sacrifice. If he thinks this is not right, then defeat the measure. But the picture has always hung there; it never was in the cellar; it has hung in that committee room where I have sat for 32 years. If it is ever to be paid for, it should be paid for now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why in the name of common sense was it not bought and paid for years ago?

Mr. BUTLER. I was one of those who asked to have it remain. Of course, I do not know anything at all about art, but I thought $15,000 was too much.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would like to have an expression, if it is not inconsistent, from the chairman of the Committee on the Library [Mr. LUCE] as to whether or not that committee is going to favor a general policy of allowing the heirs of the owners of these pictures of various kinds, and statuary or models, and so forth, which have been injected into these buildings in bygone years to approve claims of this kind?

Mr. LUCE. If the future can be judged by the past the gentleman entertains apprehensions that are hardly justified. It has been my fortune to be on the Committee on the Library for nine years, and in that time, although we have had numerous requests for the purchase of paintings, I do not recall that until this particular case we have ever recommended such a purchase to the House, and I do not foresee any likelihood that we shall change our policy in this regard. If there should be presented genuine works of art of value equal to that of the one here in question, which had endeared themselves to those who have lived among them, as this picture has appealed to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, then the same motives would perhaps inspire us that inspired us in reporting the bill authorizing this purchase, but I can give the gentleman the assurance that none of the paintings to which he has referred are likely to be bought. The statute and rule together put within the control of the Joint Committee on the Library the admission and the purchase of all works of art for the Capitol.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am glad to have that expression from the gentleman. That is what I wanted to learn. I want the House to be on its guard against a repetition of claims of this kind.

Mr. LUCE. I think he will agree with me that the record of the committee during many years justifies me in assuring him that no such pressure as he fears is in prospect and that if it should come there will be no such yielding to it as he apprehends.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the gentleman's committee, under the law, any authority to determine what paintings, pictures, busts, or other material may be brought into and left in these three buildings; and if not, does he know of anybody else or any authority to shut them out or permit them to be left here?

Mr. LUCE. My recollection of the statute and the rule is that we do have such authority. There were brought in years and years ago various things for which, of course, the present committee is not responsible.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Are you permitting more to come in during these days?

Mr. LUCE. Occasionally; perhaps once or twice a year.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. What is your present system? When they bring them in do you issue a written permit or have any record understanding as to the time and purposes and conditions under which they may be brought in and how long they may remain here, and whether or not the Government is going to be expected to pay for them? Have you any system about these pictures?

Mr. LUCE. We do have a system which seems to me to work satisfactorily. Nobody is given permission to put anything here permanently, except it be a gift formally accepted. There come in from time to time for temporary purposes such things as models of busts of the Vice Presidents for the corridor on this side of the Senate Chamber, or portraits customarily bought, as of Speakers. There were in the room of the Committee on the Library for some time a considerable number of portraits of former Justices of the Supreme Court, and I am thankful to say——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado (interposing). I do not care to have the gentleman go into all those details, but when any bust, any picture, model, or anything of that kind is deposited in these three Government buildings is some record made of the conditions upon which that deposit is made, and is there any check on them or attempt made to relieve the Government from any obligation to pay for them or to let them stay here any longer than the Government desires to have them? I want to have the House fully understand this condition of these matters and, if possible, prevent our being imposed upon in the future.

Mr. LUCE. We have no authority to make any agreement other than through the medium of a duly enacted bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion for the purpose of obtaining certain information relative to the pictures that are in the Naval Affairs Committee room. I would like to ask the chairman of the Library Committee, if I may have his attention, whether he has any information relative to the other two pictures that are in the Naval Affairs Committee room, one relating to the surrender of the German fleet and the other supposed to be a painting representing camouflage. I would like to ask the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee whether he has any information about those pictures.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; they were painted under general statutory authority given to the department. Those pictures belong to the Navy Department, and in order to make our walls look pretty we begged them to cover the walls up with these beautiful paintings, and my friend knows that the walls are not very beautiful. The pictures all belong to the Government, and the department can take them away at any time. During the exposition at Philadelphia they did remove the pictures, but brought them back afterwards. The picture I refer to, I know my friend will agree, is the most beautiful thing we have there. Its influence is good, is it not?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I agree with the chairman that that is a very nice picture, but I want to make this observation: If we are to be called upon to pay for the three pictures that are now hanging in the rooms of the Committee on Naval Affairs, there is one picture there, entitled "Camouflage," that looks like somebody accidentally spilled a bucket of paint on the canvas.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is futuristic art.

Mr. McCLINTIC. If that is art, then I have no knowledge of painting, and I hope the authorities in charge, and especially the chairman of the Library Committee, will take a peep at that picture which has paint spread all over it and is supposed to represent something that is very beautiful and artistic, before ever authorizing the payment of a large sum of money for something that I am sure the gentleman would not have in his own home.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. The gentleman spoke about a bucket of paint being spread over a "camouflage" picture. Is not that itself camouflage?

Mr. McCLINTIC. It looks like somebody just kicked it over.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman would not expect to find poetry in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD——

Mr. McCLINTIC. I have seen it there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And you can not find art in a war picture. Art and war are inconsistent.

Mr. McCLINTIC. In any event, the policy of paying for these pictures ought to be thoroughly understood by the Members of the House, and we ought to have some one charged with this responsibility, so that the distinguished chairman of my committee would not have to come here and plead for an appropriation to take care of somebody's claim against the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to assure my good friend that this is the last appeal I am going to make for any picture. I am not buying pictures, and I am not going to ask the Government to buy them. My friend and I agree upon many things, and I know the gentleman will agree with me that the influence of that picture is a good one.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am not going to object to this. The Committee on Naval Affairs needs more peace pictures. We would be a whole lot better off if we could adhere to policies of that kind rather than having these war scares thrown into us all the time for the purpose of building up a gigantic navy.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I take it we are now up to Great Britain on the 5–5–3 ratio so far as navy art is concerned.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me ask the gentleman what business he thinks this picture of peace has over there anyway, when we are appropriating half a billion dollars for war vessels?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am agreeing with the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee about this matter, because it is the only thing in the Naval Committee that points toward peace.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is a picture of a battleship at that.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes; but it is painted white and represents peace.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has looked at the picture and has admired it. The gentleman has told me so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that when the act authorizing the purchase of this particular picture was up I conferred with some of my friends in New York who are artists, and they told me that Mr. Dean, the artist, who is now dead——

Mr. BUTLER. He died about 12 years ago, my friends.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; and I was told that it was his original intention to donate this picture to the House or to the Congress. In fact, it was so announced at the time. Only after his death did a request come forward or a claim for payment for this picture; is that correct?

Mr. BUTLER. No. You understand, Mr. Dean has been dead about 12 years, and as long as 25 years ago the people who spoke for him asked $15,000 to $20,000. I may say to my friend that I was one of those who said I did not think the picture was worth that amount. I did not know anything about art, as I have already stated, but I did not think it was worth that amount of money. The time has now come when the Government should buy it, if it is ever going to do so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Five thousand dollars during the last years of Mr. Dean's life would have been very helpful to him.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it would have been. I think the money would have been helpful to him just as it will be helpful now to his daughters.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That I do not know.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROMJUE) there were—ayes 44, noes 6,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and installation for the Senate Chamber and the Hall of the House of Representatives of complete, improved ventilation, dehumidifying air conditioning apparatus with automatically controlled ducts and water piping for the connection of the different units of such apparatus, and for all necessary structural alterations required for such installation, including personal services, traveling and other necessary expenses incident thereto, $323,000, to be available immediately and to be expended by the Architect of the Capitol without compliance with sections 3709 and 3744 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, on page 23, line 17, after the word "services," I move to insert the word "advertising."

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a point of order against the section. Must I make it now?

Mr. MURPHY. I will ask the gentleman what his point of order is?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has offered an amendment.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I was on my feet seeking recognition from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman knows that the chairman of the committee gets preference to another Member in offering an amendment. If the gentleman intended to make a point of order, he should have stated the purpose in asking recognition.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I was trying to get the attention of the Chair before I could do anything. I made a point of order at the earliest possible moment. I was on my feet instantly demanding recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington make a point of order or reserve it?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I make the point of order, but I will reserve it if the chairman of the committee desires.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman waive his point of order to everything except the last two lines?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Washington now makes his point of order, the Chair would like to know to what language in the paragraph the point of order is directed.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. To all the language from line 11 to line 21, inclusive, being legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MURPHY. The committee will admit, Mr. Chairman, that there is some language in the paragraph that is subject to a point of order. Of course, if the gentleman from Washington insists on the technicality, we will have to admit that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to propound this inquiry: Clearly lines 20 and 21 are subject to a point of order, because it seeks to amend existing law. If the point of order is sustained, an amendment containing the same provisions as in the paragraph, but omitting the objectionable part, would be in order, would it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule on that when it is offered.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In order that Members present may know why I make the point of order I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. It will not be on the point of order but on the merits of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington has made a point of order and stated the ground on which he made it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I have stated that I would reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Washington will be permitted to reserve his point of order, and he asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

Mr. MURPHY. If the gentleman from Washington is going to insist on his point of order, we will have it made now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio apparently insists on the regular order, and the regular order is whether the gentleman desires to make the point of order.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If the gentleman prefers, I will make it instead of reserving it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will have to be sustained.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and installation for the Senate Chamber and the Hall of the House of Representatives of complete, improved ventilation, dehumidifying air conditioning apparatus with automatically controlled ducts and water piping for the connection of the different units of such apparatus, and for all necessary structural alterations required for such installation, including personal services, traveling and other necessary expenses incident thereto, $323,000, to be available immediately and to be expended by the Architect of the Capitol.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to the amendment. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman is too late; he has already discussed it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No; I have not discussed it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman rose and said he proposed to offer an amendment. The Chair then announced that the Clerk would report the amendment. Thereupon the gentleman apparently changed his mind and proceeded to make a point of order.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If the Chair rules that I am too late in making the point of order, then, of course, I can take no exception to that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, in order to relieve the Chair of any embarrassment, I make the point of order that the point of order made by the gentleman from Washington comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is to strike out $323,000 and insert in lieu thereof $23,000, and on that I want to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this is in regard to the ventilation of this Chamber and the Senate Chamber. If we want to ventilate, then why do we want to ventilate? First, let me say, probably no one here is qualified to say whether this should be done or should not be done. Therefore the Architect of the Capitol called on the United States Public Health Bureau to make a thorough investigation and report upon it, and I am going to read to you their summary and conclusions. They say:

(1) As a result of the study presented in the foregoing pages of the report we are led to the conclusion that the air of the Hall of the House of Representatives does not contain carbon monoxide, all our tests for this toxic gas having been negative.

(2) Our study discloses the fact that bacteria ranging in number from a few to more than 300 per cubic meter of air were present in the Hall. The organisms which we found were, however, the usual air forms, and the number is about the same as that encountered in most habitations. We feel that the presence of these organism has little or no bearing on the present problem of ventilation.

(3) Our study also discloses the fact that the dust content of the air is approximately 25 particles per cubic centimeter, a number usually found in homes and offices. To this finding we would therefore attach no significance as having any bearing on the problem at hand.

(4) The carbon dioxide content of the Hall at no time during our investigations exceeded 5.5 parts per 10,000, and an average of our determinations (95) showed 3.8 parts. This normal carbon-dioxide content indicates that sufficient air change is always taking place in the Chamber, a fact independently arrived at by measurements of change produced by the intake and exhaust fans.

They state earlier in their report that 10 parts per 10,000 is not excessive. They show that instead of 10 parts per 10,000 on the average it runs only 3.8 parts per 10,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the report disclose when these tests were made?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. They were made during the forenoon and from 1 o'clock to 2.30 o'clock p. m., and in the latter part of the afternoon.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is when the House was in session?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. RAMSEYER. When there was a good crowd here?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. They state that the crowd varied from an ordinary to a large attendance.

(5) Our study of the fans in use and of the requirements of the room leads us to the belief that the fans are of sufficient size and capable of supplying the required amount of air to the Hall.

(6) The most important finding of our study is that the Hall is subject to overheating. We have made 103 determinations of temperature. Considering 68°–72° as the most comfortable temperature for an assembly hall, such as the one in question, we find the degree of overheating to be at times as much as 2°–3°.

(7) Our observations of relative humidity, of which we have made 103, indicate that on most occasions this is below 30 per cent. Only when the temperature was below 70° did observations show relative humidities over 30 per cent, without recourse to any special means of adding moisture to the air after warming it.

RECOMMENDATIONS

As a result of our study we urge that strict efforts be made, by regulation of the temperature of the incoming air, to keep the temperature of the Hall no higher than 72°, and that, if necessary, the velocity of air entering the Hall be so decreased as to render the drafts of incoming air unobjectionable. In addition to this, we feel that means should be provided for keeping the relative humidity of the air of the Hall over 30 per cent at all times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state the date of the report from which he has just read, and who signed it?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. This report is signed by the proper acting official of the United States Bureau of Public Health, Doctor Williams.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman to page 129 of the hearings, where he will find that Surgeon General Cumming submits a report signed by C. E. A. Winslow, chairman, Frank Irving Cooper, A. M. Feldman, D. D. Kimball, F. R. Still, R. E. Hall, and A. C. Willard, recommending everything that is recommended by the architect.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; I can explain that. They called on these specialists all over the United States to give a general outline of how a new ventilating system could be installed. The Health Department did not make a recommendation that anything of this kind be done. They say a little less heat and a little more humidity. There are 390,400 cubic feet in this Chamber. There are 310 outlets, hidden away up yonder at the edge of the glass in the roof, besides 20 double doors around the walls of this floor and the gallery. There is 51,000 cubic feet of fresh air coming into the Chamber every minute. All of the air in this Chamber is changed seven and seven-tenths times every hour, according to their report, and the fans will change it oftener if thought advisable.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; gladly.

Mr. MURPHY. Does the gentleman mean to tell the Members of the House that the present ventilating system of this Chamber is modern?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I mean to tell the Members of this House that the Bureau of Public Health of the United States, after making a thorough examination by a hundred tests, reports just as I said, that it is heated 2° or 3° above what it should be, and that there should be more moisture added to the air. And so I am in favor of an appropriation of $23,000 in order to install a tank, or two or three, of water through which this heated air may be forced, so as to bring up the moisture content and still maintain a lower temperature.

Mr. MURPHY. Where does the gentleman get the figures "$23,000"?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I think it is too much, but I want it to be ample.

Now, I want the chairman of the committee to permit me to say that of course, I have no personal interest in this matter any more than any other Member. I am a physician by profession. I spent 25 years in very active practice; I have had training in many hospitals in this country and in London, Vienna, and Berlin. I am not mentioning this except as it may have some bearing on what I am saying at this time. I do not believe that this expenditure of money as proposed in this bill is necessary. I want to lay the facts before the Committee of the Whole House so that it can determine this question.

Mr. MURPHY. Can the gentleman tell us how many years the present ventilating system here has been in existence?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. About as long as this Chamber.

Mr. MURPHY. About 30 years, I think. Nothing has been done in that time to modernize it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the Bureau of Public Health say it should be changed?

Mr. MURPHY. If the gentleman from Washington had read these hearings, I dare say he would not have read what he has been reading.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. This statement from which I have read is the complete statement from the United States Public Health Service.

Mr. MURPHY. We have had an entirely different story from Doctor Greenburg, who is the sanitary engineer for the Public Health Service. We have that report in our hearings.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I could not find it complete there.

Mr. MURPHY. It is all there. Will the gentleman take a copy of the hearings and read what Doctor Greenburg says?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will read here from another place in this report about the carbon dioxide.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Would the gentleman be generous enough to let me have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I read several conclusions:

The carbon dioxide determinations indicate that at all times a sufficient supply of unused air is present. * * *

Our carbon dioxide measurements clearly confirm those of February 16, indicating a wholly sufficient amount of air change at all times. * * *

Our carbon dioxide analyses, however, indicate that sufficient air change is always taking place, as our average observation was at no time over 4.5 parts per 10,000. * * *

And, lastly, our carbon dioxide analyses indicated that at all times sufficient air change took place, in spite of the fact that we had only approximately 6.2 air changes per hour, as contrasted with 7.7 and 9.7 in the earlier studies.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The gentleman has just stated that over 200 Members of both Houses of Congress have died within 35 years. Does the gentleman think the ventilation has had much to do with their deaths?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I do not. I took the trouble to consult the records of the Sergeant at Arms' office on that subject, and I find that in every Congress, from the Sixty-third Congress down to the present, with the exception of one, most of the deaths occurred during the spring, summer, and fall months. I have the figures here from December to March, and the number of deaths that occurred during that time, and the total number.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman put those figures in the RECORD?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes. I will explain that it was difficult to ascertain the number of deaths in a Congress because a Member may have been reelected to the following Congress and his death noted in both places.

The following table shows the approximate number of deaths of House Members during the period indicated:

Sixty-third Congress, 11 deaths; 5 during December, January, and February.

Sixty-fourth Congress, 11 deaths; 6 during December, January, and February.

Sixty-fifth Congress, 15 deaths; 5 during December, January, and February.

Sixty-sixth Congress, 11 deaths; 1 during December, January, and February.

Sixty-seventh Congress, 19 deaths; 8 during December, January, and February.

Sixty-eighth Congress, 19 deaths; 4 during December, January, and February.

Sixty-ninth Congress, 9 deaths; 4 during December, January, and February.

Of 95 deaths, 33 occurred during the months of January, February, and March.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I am glad to yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. Has the gentleman any statistics to show that there is a higher death rate among men of the same age who are in Congress and men outside of Congress?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have two minutes more. I am interested in this.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that pneumonia is a very common and very fatal disease in men above middle life, especially beyond 60 years of age, so that it is not at all unusual or out of the ordinary that there should have been a considerable number of deaths from pneumonia. But, as I have stated, the vast majority of deaths in the past 14 years have been in the spring, summer, and fall months, and not during the winter.

Mr. STEVENSON. Consequently when Congress was not in session.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no immortality that attaches to a certificate of election.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman from South Carolina may have inferred that, but I do not know that he had that in mind.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I yield to my friend.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman will not contend for a moment that the present system of ventilating this room is modern?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I contend we are supplied with an abundance of good, pure air, which is slightly overheated and which needs a little moisture added to it, and this statement is based on the repeated statements of the United States Bureau of Public Health, and we have no better authority.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If, as the gentleman says, the air which we breathe here is warmer than it ought to be, and if, as he says, the air contains less humidity than it ought to contain—and he must say that, because there is no way of adding humidity to the air, because it comes in here dry and we breathe it dry——

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Moisture could easily be added before it comes in.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But there is nothing of that kind now.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If that is true, that the air is too dry and too hot, is not the American Congress entitled to the comfort that is obtainable in modern theaters, modern auditoriums, and buildings that are being constructed at the present time?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But I would not spend a third of a million dollars to turn the heat off in my home.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would spend a million dollars to save the health of the American Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, those of you who have copies of the hearings I wish would turn to page 137, and I am going to ask you to bear with me just a little while I read some of the testimony that was given by Doctor Greenburg, who is the sanitary engineer of the Public Health Service. Doctor Greenburg appeared before our committee and Mr. SANDLIN, one of the members of our committee, said:

> This problem is mostly one of temperature?
> Doctor GREENBURG. It is one of temperature and has humidity and air motion associated with it.
>
> Mr. WELSH. It is a problem of evaporation, is it not?
> Doctor GREENBURG. It is mainly one of cooling of the body. This involves temperature, humidity, and air motion. These are the three important factors in designing a ventilation system, and in designing such a system these three factors must be taken into consideration. In the old system there is no provision for satisfactory air distribution and air motion and for proper temperature and humidity control.

The gentleman from Washington is anxious to save a few dollars for the United States, and yet he has frankly admitted that the ventilating system in this room is not modern. You can go into any moving-picture theater in the city of Washington and feel safe, because they have adopted modern methods of ventilation. They prepare the air for their patrons, but here in the Nation's Capitol, where 435 men, who are picked from among the 120,000,000 people, come to legislate, there is no modern system of ventilation, and I think the health of those 435 men should be looked after. The committee feels they should be furnished with a suitable place wherein to attend to the business of the public. Thirty years have passed since anything has been done to make comfort possible in this Chamber, and the gentleman from Washington thinks that $23,000 is a sufficient amount to cool the air, to wash the air, and to do all the things that are needed in modernizing the ventilating system of this House.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman, of course, knows that by shutting off one or two coils, which would probably take a couple of minutes, the temperature can be reduced, so that part is disposed of, and all that is necessary is to add moisture.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. As I understand it, this $323,000 applies to the Senate as well as to the House?

Mr. MURPHY. That is correct.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I want to supplement what the chairman of the subcommittee says, that the Members here are entitled to fresh air and pure air.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. They are getting seven changes of air every hour in this big room, and nearly eight.

Mr. MURPHY. The air which comes into this room comes in along the carpet and, unfortunately, Members of the House often forget and expectorate on the floor. When that dries it is picked up in the dust and we breathe it, and there are a few of us who believe we are entitled to have clean air, and I hope the wisdom of this House will suggest the appropriation of sufficient funds for the care of the health of the people sent here to represent this Nation in its legislative establishment.

The means we have for ventilating the Chamber are not controlled, they are not modern, and here is a doctor, a man who gathers in the shekels of the folks for keeping their health secure, advocating filthy air.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. The gentleman does not think he is looking for a few patients? [Laughter.]

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman is facetious.

Mr. ABERNETHY. He practices on us for nothing.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; gladly.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand the report from which the gentleman from Washington read to be official; that is, from the United States health authorities. The gentleman does not mean to intimate that that great institution is desirous of promoting ill health in order to practice on anybody?

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman is quite correct. That is a report from the Public Health Department of this Government; but the report we are bringing to the attention of the committee is a later report and one based on a further study of the proposition.

Mr. STEVENSON. By the same board?

Mr. MURPHY. By the same bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, may I proceed further with the reading of this testimony?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question just at that point?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Has there ever been a later investigation than the one I read from? The gentleman may not be able to answer that question, but I will say there has not been, because the United States Bureau of Public Health told me this was their last investigation.

Mr. MURPHY. I will say to the gentleman they had this report when they recommended this system we are presenting to the committee at this time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that this matter takes up 75 pages of the hearings on this bill? The gentleman from Washington read only about one page. There are about 75 pages of the hearings devoted to this one matter. We have had an exhaustive investigation by the highest authorities in the United States. Some of these people came before our committee, and we have gone into the matter thoroughly, exhaustively, and have come to the unanimous conclusion the present obsolete system ought to be changed. When they say the air is not filthy, I will say that it is not healthy. It comes out right here at our feet, and the hot air blows the dust and dirt from the dirty carpets right up in our faces, and that is not healthful. It is not and can not be sanitary. The air should come in 30 feet over our heads instead of between our feet. Besides being dirty, the air is too hot and too dry. This system is an abomination.

Mr. MURPHY. I will say to the gentlemen of the committee that the recommendation for making this change in ventilation comes out of the report from which the gentleman has just read, and if the gentleman had gone through these hearings and had read them carefully I am sure he would not be objecting as he is to-day, because the testimony of the experts before our committee was such that it was the wisdom of the committee this improvement should be made.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. How many of the experts whose testimony you have in the hearings are engaged in the ventilating business and would like to secure such a contract?

Mr. MURPHY. Not any. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois the committee is composed of men who have business judgment, and they are just as wide awake as the average citizen of this country. We have not been subject to any influence of any kind. As my friend the gentleman from Colorado has said, 75 pages of the hearings were devoted to this one subject, because it is an important one.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. And you say that none of them——

Mr. MURPHY. Not one. I might read for the gentleman's information at this point——

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to continue reading from Doctor Greenburg's testimony:

You will note by reference to the complete report of the 1924 study, which will be presented in the record, that the Hall suffered from overheating because the regulatory means were not sufficient and carefully controlled, and that we recommended that the velocity of the incoming air be decreased because of the existence of drafts on the Members' feet. And lastly, that some means be provided for increasing the relative humidity or moisture content of the Hall. All of these criticisms are still valid and constitute our objections to the system at this time. In addition to the above, it must be pointed out that no means are at present in existence for cooling the Hall in the summer months of the year.

The system, which has just been approved by the ventilating committee, of which Doctor Winslow is chairman, and which is composed of the ablest men in the field at this time, makes ample and liberal provision for all of these recommendations of the 1924 report.

May I take the liberty of directing the attention of the gentlemen to the last paragraph of the 1924 report, for here our recommendations are presented completely free of technical details.

Mr. TAYLOR. In the new theaters throughout the country, are they installing plants of this kind in this way to bring the air down and regulate the temperature, the humidity, and the circulation?

Doctor GREENBURG. Yes; they are. In the new, big, and better theaters they have such systems. But the cost is high and the smaller theaters can not usually afford them. In the bigger and better playhouses they are putting in these systems all the time.

Mr. TAYLOR. Do they spend as much as $323,000 to do it?

Doctor GREENBURG. I think the system at the Roxy Theater in New York must have cost practically that much. It cost probably in that neighborhood. The system in the Paramount Theater in New York probably cost about the same amount also. The Roxy Theater seats 6,000 people and the Paramount 3,540 people. Both of these theaters were ventilated by the company to whom the committee now desires to award your contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five additional minutes, inasmuch as this is an important matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio if there are going to be competitive bids on this work?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; they are going to have competitive bids. [Reading:]

Mr. HOLADAY. Doctor Greenburg, are the Members of the House suffering, is their health being injured, by the present system of ventilation?

Doctor GREENBURG. I can not say exactly how much their health is being injured, but I certainly feel that if the system of ventilation were improved the Members would feel better and would undoubtedly be in better physical condition and feel more active and more alert. When the atmosphere becomes overheated it detracts from a man's physical and mental abilities. In that way I think they are being injured to a certain extent.

Studies on the question of ventilation are now being made with a great deal of care, and so far it has been found, for example, in studies made on school children in New York that there is more respiratory disease amongst the children when the conditions are not right than when the conditions are maintained at about the right point. In study cited it was found that there was about 18 per cent more absences from colds and respiratory diseases where the poor conditions were maintained than when atmospheric conditions were maintained at about the proper level.

I am making some studies now of school children in New Haven, Conn., and the facts so far confirm those learned from the study made in New York.

Many studies have been made in reference to the efficiency of physical labor at different temperatures, and they have all indicated that when the temperature is not maintained at the right point the physical efficiency drops off. This means that when the body has to work hard to lose its excess heat it is laboring under an extra load, and if you keep on loading up the body in that way you decrease its physical efficiency.

Mr. MURPHY. Is it the judgment of the Public Health Service that the air conditions here are so bad that they really should be changed?

Doctor GREENBURG. I would like Doctor Thompson to answer that question. It was the opinion of all the men who studied the system that it should really be revamped and made so that it could maintain conditions which were more suitable for the Members.

Mr. MURPHY. May I at this point ask Doctor Thompson if the experts who went into this matter suggested that the conditions were bad and that a change should be made?

Doctor THOMPSON. I think Doctor Greenburg has explained it very well. These are intangible things that we have to deal with. You have such conditions resulting where a good system of ventilation is not available. It is also possible that we may be made more susceptible to breakdowns in health by having this extra strain put on the constitution. Most of us have reached the age where we should not be subjected to constant extra strains put upon us.

Of course, anybody can get along in any kind of ventilation, but we felt that you were entitled to a system which would be equal to what they have in theaters and places of that kind for maintaining the comfort and health of their people, and that if they can have such a system as that you gentlemen were entitled to at least that much.

Mr. MURPHY. Do you look upon the present ventilating system as being obsolete as compared with modern ventilating systems?

Doctor THOMPSON. Yes; I do.

Mr. MURPHY. When was the present system put in here? Perhaps Mr. Lynn can answer that question.

Mr. LYNN. It has been in for about 30 years. It has just been added to from time to time by putting in larger exhaust fans, and things of that kind. But the system has been in for a great many years.

Mr. TAYLOR. The thing that brought this matter up originally was the fact that Members of the House were complaining that when they sat in the Hall of the House for 3, 4, or 5 hours they would go away completely exhausted, and they seemed to think that possibly it might help them in that way.

As to whether or not we should go ahead and spend all this money at this time or wait until this system has been tried out further and they know more about it than they do now, is a question.

Mr. SANDLIN. I think most of the Members heretofore have had the feeling and the belief that there was a lot of foul air in the Hall.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes; the Members of the House think it is insanitary, and I know people in the galleries always complain that they have that same feeling. Women complain that when they go and sit in the galleries, when the Hall of the House is filled by Members, that the air is bad.

Mr. SANDLIN. That is due to the heat and the humidity?

Doctor GREENBURG. That is probably due to the fact that down on the floor of the House the temperature conditions are approximately comfortable and then when the air is warmed it rises, and in the gallery the temperature is probably too high.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to ask the indulgence of the committee for five more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio to proceed for five additional minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. On page 157 of the hearings Doctor Greenburg, in reply to a question by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], said:

Doctor GREENBURG. I hesitated very much to say that I felt the present ventilating system was injurious to the health of the Members, because it is exceedingly difficult to prove such a thing. It is a problem which would require long study, and study of many different kinds, for example, statistical studies of the death rate of Members, as compared with that of the normal population.

It is a very difficult problem, if it could be satisfactorily done at all.

Mr. MURPHY. But it is a fact, however, that this ventilating system is not approved by present-day sanitation, along ventilating lines?

Doctor GREENBURG. Absolutely.

Mr. LYNN. This system simply puts so many cubic feet of air per minute in the Chamber and it exhausts so many cubic feet per minute. It supplies fresh air to the House Chamber; that is the extent of the system.

Mr. MURPHY. Throughout the country every great building that goes up, where great crowds assemble, is being equipped with the new ventilating system?

Doctor GREENBURG. Very many of them. I hesitated very much to say that the existing system was actually detrimental to health. On the other hand, we must not minimize the feeling of discomfort, because when you are uncomfortable it is definite evidence that conditions are wrong, that your body is being imposed upon. If this continues long enough, it seems very fair to assume that it will harm the body. There is no question about it.

Gentlemen of the House, you have listened carefully to the reading of this testimony from the hearings. The matter is up to you. Experts on ventilation scattered over the entire country were called into consultation by the Architect of the Capitol. Not one of these gentlemen has anything whatever to do with any ventilation company doing business in this country. Bids were asked tentatively of those qualified to do the work. I think five ventilating companies in this country submitted plans and bids on this work. It was the wisdom of this board of experts, serving without pay, simply giving their very best judgment to their Government, that a certain firm should be given the contract.

The Architect of the Capitol appeared before the committee with this proposition, giving the background for his judgment in recommending to the committee these people to do this work. The judgment of the committee was that, this being America and all things being equal, that everyone engaged in the ventilation business in this country should have an equal chance at the starting point and that these plans prepared by these experts should be resubmitted and that the best bid received by the Architect and on the approval of the board of five experts, none of whom have any financial interest in any ventilating company, should meet in consultation, and those bidding would be awarded the contract.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And we do not have to accept any bid at all—either the highest or the lowest.

Mr. MURPHY. No; we reserve the right to accept the highest bid if it is considered to be the best by those best qualified to judge, and we reserve the right to reject any or all bids. So we believe the committee has been exceedingly fair and just. We give every American business man engaged in the business an equal chance at the starting point, and if he has the ability to do and to achieve, his reward will be commensurate with his ability.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I am unable to understand how it is you make all of these reservations when we pass this provision without any strings to it.

Mr. MURPHY. I might say that a year ago bids and estimates were asked for, and the amount was four hundred and some odd thousand dollars. Again I want to pay tribute to the wisdom and business sagacity of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. MADDEN], who has saved the country in that item alone $107,000.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If we had brought that before the House a year or two ago, you would have made the same argument then that you do now. I was on the committee at the time, and I opposed it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is not the gentleman from Ohio unintentionally overstating his case when he says that the House reserves the right to reject the highest bid? As the paragraph stands it will have to be awarded in compliance with the existing law.

Mr. MURPHY. The language in the bill went out on the point of order, but it is possible to have the language reinserted at the other end of the Capitol, because the Senate is interested in this matter, and the appropriation is carried for the House and the Senate Chambers.

I might say for the benefit of the House that the Senate has had hearings on the proposition to enlarge the Senate Chamber in addition to furnishing a new ventilation system. They believe over there that it is money well spent. I think some one told me that they had figures to show that in a financial way a tremendous saving would be made, but we are not going to talk about that. We are doubly interested in trying to modernize the Chambers of this Capitol. We want to put a new ventilating system in the Senate Chamber and in the Hall of the House equal to that which can be found in any moving-picture house in a town of 25,000 inhabitants.

Mr. MENGES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am perfectly willing to have this Chamber ventilated, so that we will have pure air and there will be no disease contracted by any Member in this House from impure air. I do not oppose a ventilating system, but I do think that we ought to be a little careful about submitting specifications to the various bidders and that we do not place too much dependence on experts. I happened to come in contact with some of the things that happen here, and I am not impugning the motives of anyone, but the group of experts who recommended this system—and I understand the committee adopted it—gave the contract or suggested that the contract should be given to the highest bidder. Now, my friends, I happen to have in my district—and I am going to be frank about it—a concern which is manufacturing ventilating systems. The York Ice Machine Manufacturing Co. put in a bid for the installation of this project of $139,680, while the Carrier Engineering Corporation, to which the experts suggested the award should be given, asked $326,000.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Give us the figures in dollars and cents for comparison.

Mr. MENGES. It is 139 as against 326 plus. I can give the gentleman the figures exactly. For the complete system the highest bid, which the experts suggested should be accepted, was $326,000 for the same thing the firm in my district asked $139,680—$279,000 plus.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is, as provided in the bill?

Mr. MENGES. No; that is not as provided in the bill. But that was the bid that was made and accepted, or recommended by the corps of experts to be accepted.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And the other responsible bidder to whom the gentleman refers bid how much?

Mr. MENGES. One hundred and thirty-nine thousand six hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Now, we can understand and compare $139,000 with $279,000. I do not question the high character of everyone connected with this investigation, but call attention to the great disparity of the estimates.

Mr. MENGES. Do not think that I am endeavoring to put in question the character of this committee, but I say to you that this concern that I refer to is a responsible concern. During the last year they put ventilating systems into the largest theaters in New York, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh. I do not know that they have gone any further west. They put in 16 ventilating systems. Not only that, but they are a very responsible concern. They have built up a business of $20,000,000 and they have built it up by being absolutely and strictly honest, living up to their agreements and contracts. I am here not to say to whom you shall give this contract but to suggest that I think we should be a little careful.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MENGES. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Did the gentleman read the report on page 129 giving the reasons why they recommended the Carrier Engineering Corporation, and showing why the other bids did not fill the bill?

Mr. MENGES. I did read that, but it does not explain anything to me.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MENGES. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Does the gentleman know of one particular case where any theater in the United States ever spent $200,000 for just a ventilating system?

Mr. MENGES. I do not know anything about the cost for the installation of a ventilating system.

Mr. BLOOM. Does not the gentleman know, if he knows anything about the ventilating——

Mr. MENGES. Oh, I am not a ventilating engineer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Does not the gentleman know or realize that there is no theater in the United States that ever spent $100,000 for a ventilating system?

Mr. MENGES. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. BLOOM. Is not the gentleman recommending that we spend $200,000 for ventilating the Chamber?

Mr. MENGES. I have not recommended any amount.

Mr. BLOOM. I thought I heard that.

Mr. MENGES. I did not recommend any amount. I said that I am in favor of ventilating this room and ventilating it in such a way that every Member of this House shall have all of the fresh air that he or she needs.

Mr. BLOOM. I will say this: I will guarantee that you will have all of the fresh air you want if you will let me ventilate this Chamber for $100,000.

Mr. MENGES. I am not able to say whether the gentleman could do it or not.

Mr. BLOOM. I will take the contract right now to ventilate this Chamber properly for $100,000.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MENGES. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Did the gentleman observe that in the reading of all of the pages of testimony by Mr. MURPHY the experts made two points, and two only? One was that the room was overheated, and they tell me that is why some Members are inclined to get drowsy during the latter part of the afternoon. That can be changed in five minutes at this end of the Capitol and at the other end of the Capitol by the two engineers. Anybody can shut off the heat. You do not need a third of a million dollars to do that. The other thing they recommend is more moisture. That is all they do recommend. Two very simple modifications of our present system, but the results will be apparent.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MENGES. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. I just happened to come in at the tail end of this thing. If you want to ventilate this Chamber and ventilate it correctly so that you will not have this bad, foul air, you can do it easily for a hundred thousand dollars. You must have a proper exhaust, which you have not got here.

Mr. MENGES. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. BLOOM. I do not want to make a speech. I thought that the gentleman recommended that we give a contract to some one he mentioned for a certain sum of money.

Mr. MENGES. No; I did not. I did not recommend anything of the sort.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MENGES. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not the gentleman think we ought to award this contract to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM]?

Mr. MENGES. Mr. Chairman, I am not advocating the adoption of any one of the amounts that have been specified by the people who have made bids on this proposition, neither am I suggesting the acceptance of Mr. BLOOM's offer. The people that I have the honor to represent have done practically all of the ventilating for the United States Navy Department in their ships for the last 10 years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MENGES. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do I understand the gentleman to convey the impression that there will not be free and unrestricted competition in the awarding of this contract?

Mr. MENGES. I did not mean to convey that idea.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I understood the statement of the chairman correctly, there will be competitive bidding.

Mr. MENGES. That is exactly what I want.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And that the contract will be awarded to the bidder that complies with the plans and specifications and submits the lowest responsible bid.

Mr. MENGES. I am not asking for any preference for the concern I am representing but that they shall have equal opportunity.

Mr. MURPHY. That is just what the committee has arranged for. We have an amendment here which we will submit when this is out of the way.

Mr. MENGES. I am glad you have that, Mr. Chairman, because I was going to offer one if you had not.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the subcommittee I joined in the report on this item. But there are a few facts I would like to bring to your attention. As I recall the evidence before the subcommittee, there was no evidence to show that the atmospheric conditions in this House were essentially injurious to the health of the Members. As to the gentleman referred to as Doctor Greenburg, I see that he is so referred to in the hearings, but it is my impression that he is not a doctor, but a sanitary engineer. Here is what he says. He was asked:

Mr. HOLADAY. Doctor Greenburg, are the Members of the House suffering, is their health being injured, by the present system of ventilation?

Doctor GREENBURG. I can not say exactly how much their health is being injured, but I certainly feel that if the system of ventilation were improved the Members would feel better and would undoubtedly be in better physical condition and feel more active and more alert. When the atmosphere becomes overheated it detracts from a man's physical and mental abilities. In that way I think they are being injured, to a certain extent.

Now, as I recall the evidence, that is about as strong a statement as there is in the record going to show that the present condition is injurious to the public health.

The committee was faced with this proposition: For a good many years there has been a demand from individual Members for an improvement in the ventilating system. The Public Health Service, when this proposition was put up to them, called in a committee of experts, and they made a report. Now, I want to call your attention especially to this: This is the testimony of Doctor Thompson. The question was not up to that commission as to whether we needed a ventilating system. The question that was put up to them was on the basis that the House desired a system, and they were asked their opinion as to what the best thing was. Doctor Thompson says:

When that committee considered a system they did not take into consideration the cost.

In other words, this committee is not going into a question of whether or not we needed a change. They assumed that the House had decided that they did need a change. But from the theoretical and scientific standpoint, regardless of the demand for or the cost of, they reported what they thought was the best system. I read:

We called together this committee of experts because we felt that their opinion would give you the best system possible at the present time, in accordance with health and sanitation.

When that committee considered a system they did not take into consideration the cost. They did not feel that that was their province. Their province was to outline to you what they felt was the most satisfactory type of system to give you the most healthful and sanitary conditions. They did not enter into the cost. Their opinion was expressed only about the new system and what would be desirable for the new system.

Mr. HOLADAY. Did they go into the question as to how badly an improvement in the ventilating system was needed? Did they consider that?

Doctor THOMPSON. They really had not had that put up to them. It was put up to them that Congress desired to have a new system installed and what you wanted was an opinion as to the best type of system to be installed. They did not have any suggestion as to that point; that rested with the Members of Congress.

Now, this commission made their report regardless of the cost. They reported what in their opinion would be the best system. That report involved not specific specifications, but general specifications. Then competitive bids were asked for, and some five different companies came in. There is a big spread between their bids, and it is very natural that there should be, because they were not bidding on exact specifications but on a general plan, and each bidder submitted his own plan, so that there is no way that I know of by which we can compare the bids. Perhaps the man who wanted $100,000 more than the firm from Pennsylvania offered a better system. I presume that he did.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not wish to take five minutes. I have courage enough to say here what I have said so many times, when we have been frequently forced to leave this Chamber practically from mental exhaustion and unable further to follow the debates. I do not need the medical profession to tell me when ventilation is needed. When our offices need fresh air we know when it is time to raise the window, and when necessary to have water around to change the humidity. This room is supposed to properly accommodate 435 Members of Congress, many employees, and perhaps 500 visitors from 12 o'clock noon to 6 o'clock each day, and with an up-to-date ventilating system. Nearly every other Member of the House must feel that the ventilation is not satisfactory, and we often complain that we can not remain in the Chamber and keep keenly alert under such conditions.

We can not have been wrong all of this time. We do not need a doctor to tell us about lack of ventilation, though we do need them to tell us about those diseases the cause and effects of which we do not know. I am sure the common sense of the situation appeals to us, and I am very glad to vote in favor, after six years of experience here. Let us have the courage to rise and state openly our criticisms of this situation. The ventilation here is certainly very bad indeed. We know it is of our own experience and we are not to be convinced by the differing viewpoints of experts, as cited in the debate, on a matter of which we have such intimate knowledge.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman, but I do not know anything about his $100,000 estimate.

Mr. BLOOM. That is not the question I am going to ask the gentleman. The question I am going to ask the gentleman is whether he knows that any one of the plans suggested will relieve the situation?

Mr. GIFFORD. I have faith in those intrusted to carry out our instructions. I am not interested in anybody or firm who wants a contract. I am interested not only for our health, but that we may stay here and be active and alert in our duties. [Applause.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I hope the members of the committee will vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington, because the health of the Members of this House is the most important thing to each and every one of us individually. This is your own affair. If you do not take care of yourselves you can not blame anyone else. The country will not condemn you for making things sanitary and modern here. When it comes to the judgment of those five men who have been selected for their high intelligence and for their high character no one can question it. When a gentleman gets up on this floor and says, "I will do this for $100,000 "——

Mr. SANDLIN (interposing). He will have an opportunity to bid.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; he will have an opportunity to bid if he cares to do so. The gentleman will have an opportunity to enter into competitive bidding, and if he knows what he is talking about he may be able to do the work for $100,000. But the gentleman knows something about the theatrical business. He knows they do spend lots of money in providing proper ventilating systems. In my little town they spent $60,000 on a ventilating system in a little theater which seats only 800.

Mr. BLOOM. But did you not spend $40,000 on a cooling system?

Mr. MURPHY. It does not make any difference what the money was spent on. Here we are only appropriating sufficient money to cover the probable cost of the system, and in the event the work can be done for much less we will be that much better off. Gentlemen, remember that if you appropriate this money for this ventilating system you will have the very last word in scientific ventilation. You are entitled to receive that, because everyone who spends from 20 to 25 cents for admission to a moving-picture house knows that when he enters such a moving-picture house he is entering a building which is ventilated along modern lines. Surely we are entitled to that. We are doing something here for ourselves. Gentlemen, let us do it; let us meet the issue face up, with eyes to the front and with our tails over the dashboard. [Applause.] The people in this country believe in such a proposition and, therefore, I hope you will defeat the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last five words, and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to say at the outset that I am not going to oppose any plan by which you can better or change the ventilation of this Chamber. Ever since I have been in the House I have heard about such a plan being put into operation. I have watched gentlemen sit in the galleries with all kinds of instruments, testing, smelling, perfuming, and doing everything to the air. What they were trying to do I do not know, but I will say that for 40 years I have been building public buildings and I know something about ventilating chambers.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I was wondering how old the gentleman is. I thought he was a young man.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when he entered this body he was a healthy looking man, but I saw the gentleman faint on the floor of the House, and we had to carry him out.

Mr. BLOOM. I will say to my colleague that it was not the air which made me sick; it was the speeches I heard. The air was all right, but I was overcome by some of the speeches I heard at that time. I am now immune to them.

I will say this: That you can not compare this Chamber with a theater. A theater is practically sealed up. There are no doors or windows that can be opened in a theater.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There are not any here.

Mr. BLOOM. You have doors here and they are being opened and closed all the time.

No matter how hard you may try, it is impossible to create a vacuum, and the only thing you need in this Chamber, gentlemen, is to have a proper exhaust system. If you take out the foul air, good, pure air must come in. It is impossible to create the kind of vacuum that these engineers have been talking about.

Mr. BEEDY. Where is the pure air going to come from?

Mr. BLOOM. You will get it through the doors and the vents and all around here.

Mr. BEEDY. Does not the gentleman know that this Chamber is twice removed from the pure air on the outside?

Mr. BLOOM. No——

Mr. BEEDY. If the gentleman will take a trip around the Chamber and investigate he will find that is the fact.

Mr. BLOOM. I want to tell the gentleman this Chamber is not situated like a theater.

Mr. MURPHY. Does the gentleman know how the air comes into this room?

Mr. BLOOM. It comes in from all these openings and through the vents. Now, where do you take out the air?

Mr. MURPHY. May I tell the gentleman that the air that is in this room now comes in along the dirty, filthy carpet here, and is forced up into our faces?

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman will remember I said it comes in from the doors and the vents.

My idea is that if you had a proper exhaust in this building you would have proper ventilation. You have to have a proper circulation of air, the same as they have in every theater. In the top of every theater or large building they have exhaust fans that take out the bad air.

If you want to have a proper plan of ventilation, that is all right, and we should figure on it, but you can not have men connected with ventilation systems come in here with their own system and then expect to have any kind of real or proper ventilating plant.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The gentleman concedes we need a different system here from the one we have now.

Mr. BLOOM. I will concede that if you will try what I have suggested——

Mr. ABERNETHY. The air is bad now, is it not?

Mr. BLOOM. Let me answer the question, please. I will say if you want to improve the air in this Chamber, if you will give me the opportunity of putting in a proper exhaust system, I will guarantee to purify the air and have it 75 per cent better than it is now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I think we have been very liberal in allowing debate on this question, and I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The amendment to the amendment was again reported.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURPHY: On page 23, line 21, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"The foregoing appropriation may be expended without compliance with sections 3709 and 3744 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Will the gentleman explain the meaning of the amendment and just what sections are referred to?

Mr. MURPHY. This gives the experts having in charge the recommending of contracts the privilege of awarding the contract to the best bidder, not necessarily the one submitting the lowest bid as to dollars and cents, but permits them to let the contract to the best bidder even though he might be the very highest as to dollars and cents. The judgment of this board of five experts, who are not interested in any way, shape, or form in any contract with respect to this sort of work will be controlling, and under the amendment I have just offered the architect, on the advice of this board, can enter into a contract with any one of the bidders who submits the best bid.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. I do not think we ought to award contracts in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes the point of order is well taken. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MURPHY. There is no question, Mr. Chairman, but what the amendment is subject to a point of order. I am very sorry the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The point of order was raised before and the point of order was sustained and the paragraph went out. Then the gentleman offered an amendment without those lines. I am very sorry the gentleman again offered the amendment, because once a point of order is raised and sustained, I do not think the amendment should be again offered. It is out now anyway.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; it is out now.

The Clerk read as follows:

Capitol Grounds: For care and improvement of grounds surrounding the Capitol, Senate and House Office Buildings; personal and other services; care of trees; plantings; fertilizers; repairs to pavements, walks, and roadways; purchase of waterproof wearing apparel; and for snow removal by hire of men and equipment or under contract without compliance with sections 3709 and 3744 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, $72,000.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, while I was absent from the Chamber some criticism was offered in regard to the Assistant Sergeant at Arms of this House, Mr. A. C. Jordan, of Kansas. I wish now to give the membership of the House some facts.

Mr. Jordan does not come from my district or my part of the State, but for many years he was the sergeant at arms of the Kansas House of Representatives. He retained that position from year to year, session after session, because of his competency and ability to fill that position. Seven years ago when he was selected as Assistant Sergeant at Arms of this House, the members of the House of Representatives of Kansas made him a handsome present as a testimonial of their esteem and their respect.

He has served this House for many years. He has always been here every day this House has been in session when able to do so. He has always been efficient, able, and competent, and has served this House well. Last summer he met with an accident that was followed by temporary paralysis, that for months compelled him to use a cane. He has been trying to get back here all the session and worrying because he was unable to do so. A month ago he wrote me and said he had so improved that he expected to get here on the 24th day of March. He did not come, and a few days after I was advised that he was taken down with la grippe and was confined to his bed. This man has had financial reverses; he has lost his health. He ought not to be criticized because of his great misfortune in the face of the splendid service he has given this House, and I want to thank Mr. ABERNETHY for coming to the defense of Mr. Jordan this afternoon, and also the membership of the House that they did not destroy his position this afternoon by voting for the amendment offered. I thank you all in behalf of Mr. Jordan. [Applause.]

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 23, line 7, and after the word "services" insert the word "advertising."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to page 23, line 7, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7 of the amendment already adopted, on page 23, after the word "services," insert the word "advertising."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 16 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to page 16 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, what is the nature of the amendment?

Mr. MURPHY. The amendment is being offered to equalize the salary of an attendant in the press gallery. It has been the unanimous request of every member of the press gallery that this young man, who has and is rendering splendid service, should have an increase in salary. The matter was brought before the committee, but it was neglected and did not appear in the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. It will not interfere with the reorganization bill there has been so much said about?

Mr. MURPHY. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 8, strike out the figures "$1,200" and insert "$1,700." In line 14 strike out the figures "$209,641" and insert "$210,141."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. TILSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12875) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MURPHY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska, at the request of Mr. NORTON of Nebraska, for an indefinite period, on account of sickness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House, in pursuance of its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, April 15, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Mr. TILSON submitted the following tentative list of committee hearings scheduled for Monday, April 16, 1928, as reported to the floor leader by clerks of the several committees:

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

(10 a. m.)

For the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in cotton by regulating transactions on cotton-futures exchanges (H. R. 11917 and other bills relating to cotton).

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

(10.30 a. m.)

To provide for the transfer to the Department of the Interior of the public-works functions of the Federal Government (H. R. 8127).

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

(10.30 a. m.—room 377)

To revise, amend, and reenact the provisions of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia relating to the acquisition of land in the said District for the use of the United States (H. R. 12416).

SUBCOMMITTEE ON INSURANCE AND BANKING

447. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1929, for public buildings authorized under the provisions of the act approved May 25, 1926, $1,200,000 (H. Doc. No. 229); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

448. A message from the President of the United States, transmitting deficiency estimates of appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1927 and prior years, $23,495.32, and a supplemental estimate for the fiscal year 1929, $25,000; in all, $48,495.32; also a draft of proposed legislation affecting the use of an existing appropriation (H. Doc. No. 230); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

449. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriation for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1928, $65,000, and for the fiscal year 1929, $543,560; in all, $608,560; also drafts of proposed legislation affecting the use of existing appropriations (H. Doc. No. 231); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

450. A letter from the chairman of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, transmitting an agreement under date of April 7, 1928, by and between the Washington Railway & Electric Co., the Capital Traction Co., and Mr. Harley P. Wilson, owner of 98 per cent of the stock of the Washington Rapid Transit Co. (H. Doc. No. 232); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SUNDAY, April 15, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. PARKER.

Rev. Frank W. Collier, of the American University, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, the source of life and love, Father of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, who abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel, in whose care are our loved ones, the living and the departed, manifest Thy presence in our sorrow-stricken hearts as we come to express our respect and esteem for those who gave themselves so fully to the service of their country. We thank Thee for their lives, as that of those who leave their permanent callings, devoting their lives to the public service with its uncertainties and risks. Such truly become our servants. And we do well to tarry for this solemn hour in this historic Hall, the scene of the faithful labors of our friends who have gone to their eternal reward, and thus honor their memory. Bless those bound to them by the ties of blood whom they loved and who loved them. May Thy tender solace assuage their grief. Bless these their colleagues in the public service, who labored with them for their country's good, and bless the country they served so well. We ask in the name of Him who is the resurrection and the life. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings will be deferred.

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WALTER W. MAGEE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, that Sunday, April 15, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for memorial exercises in commemoration of the life, services, and character of the late WALTER W. MAGEE, former Representative from the thirty-fifth district of New York.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 167

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WALTER W. MAGEE, late a Member of this House from the State of New York.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House at the conclusion of the exercises of this day shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege not only to have a very intimate acquaintance with WALTER MAGEE, whose memory we meet here to-day to honor, but I classed him as one of my most beloved friends. He was a member of the Committee on Appropriations, over which I have the honor to preside, and as a member of that great committee he acted as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Agriculture, in which he had a very deep interest, and in the success of which he had an abiding faith. We will not meet WALTER MAGEE face to face again, and every day since the day of his death I have continued to mourn his passing. It is natural that we should pass away, just as natural as it is that we should be born. We come into the world without being consulted, and, generally speaking, we pass along out of the world without having anything to say about it. During our term on earth, if we live rightly, we live to build up a superstructure on a great foundation that will make for better living and more comfort for those who follow. The world is very much improved because of the fact that WALTER MAGEE lived. He was one of the men who in his everyday life was a living example of true worth. He believed that every man should do his duty, both to himself and to his friends, to those who were successful as well as to those who were unsuccessful, and above all he believed that as a citizen of a great country he owed a duty that could not well be ignored. He did not try to ignore it. He sought for opportunity to engage upon the things that his duty called him to do and he did those things cheerfully. He approached every subject upon which he was called to act with a determination to put the searchlight of publicity into the study of the problem which might be involved. He had a courage that was never failing, which knew no turning.

His integrity was unimpeachable. He maintained a moral standard that was worthy of emulation by everybody. Those of us who knew him well looked for him every morning with pleasure. He always came with a smile to find out what there was that he could do to advance the interest of the country that he loved so well. He had no desire to evade the responsibility. He never ran away from something that meant hard work. He approached every problem, as I have said, with a firm determination that the outcome of the study that he was called upon to make in connection with the problem should be in the interest and for the advancement of the race.

WALTER MAGEE was an ardent Republican, and as such he never faltered. He was a very bitter partisan, it might well be said; but in the exercise of his partisanship he recognized the rights of others to think and act as they thought best. If they differed from him, he was not angry. He tried to convince them by the logic of his own attitude that they were wrong and that he was right, but if he was unable to do that, he did not sulk, he smiled. He had a difficult task to perform in connection with his great work on the Committee on Appropriations. Democrats and Republicans alike will agree that he performed it well. The breath of suspicion was never cast upon the motives of WALTER MAGEE in connection with his action upon any public question, and I am sure that my Democratic friends on the committee who served intimately with him will agree with that. Everyone who knew him would say that. He first wanted to know what was right, and then it did not make any difference how much work there was to do to accomplish the right, WALTER MAGEE did his part in connection with its accomplishment. He was not afraid. He did not run away from criticism. He never trimmed his sails, he always met foursquare every wind that blew.

Let it blow as hard as it would, or adversely as it liked, WALTER MAGEE was there with a firm determination to do the right and to stand before the wind to the extent of his ability.

Oh, I do not know of anybody I loved any better. I got the word of his sudden death a thousand miles away from where it happened. I was shocked beyond measure. I could not go to help lay him away because I was under the doctor's care myself, but he lives in my heart. Every breath I take breathes a friendship for his memory and I thank God that by his example while he lived the world is better.

I was taught to believe, and I still believe it, that we will meet again, and what a joy it is to breathe that thought. It is an inspiration to live right, and we men who are open to the criticism of the unjust, as we are frequently, we men who give ourselves to the world, so to speak, particularly to our country, without hope of emolument or reward, do so because we are interested not in ourselves, not in our particular neighbor, but in the Nation, in the world and its advancement, in the movement forward of the human race. Most of us do not have to serve here for a living. Thank God we do not, but we choose to serve because we want a broader field in which to render the service we think our Nation needs than we could render in other fields. Some will think we serve because we want employment. Not at all. And that was not the spirit in which WALTER MAGEE served. He served at a great personal sacrifice. He served because he loved his country and because he loved his fellows, and he was willing to make any kind of a sacrifice that his life might not be lived in vain.

Oh, what a man he was and what a life he lived, how we men can afford to emulate him, and how his name, though not conspicuously emblazoned on the highways or on signboards nailed upon telegraph poles, will live in the future. His name is emblazoned deeper than that. His name is emblazoned in the hearts and in the minds of men, and the children of the coming generation will be taught to understand that it is men of the type of WALTER MAGEE who make for the richness of the patriotism, devotion and unselfishness in men that builds up the nations of the world and makes them move forward to better things, greater liberty, greater happiness, and greater prosperity for humanity.

WALTER MAGEE came from the greatest State of the American Union. I am sure the people from whence he came will revere his memory. That he deserved it no one can doubt; that he worked for the advancement of his particular community, while still thinking nationally, nobody knew better than I. He served directly with me on the great Subcommittee on the Post Office Department, in which we have 350,000 Americans employed, and the Treasury Department, through which every dollar of the Government's funds must pass. And what a service he rendered there, in addition to his services as chairman of the Subcommittee on Agriculture. What a service! Never absent; always working; always searching for new and better things to be done in the interest of the Nation and succeeding marvelously in everything he undertook. All of this was an inspiration to his associates. He had no personal ax to grind. He was only interested in his country. It was his only client. He could not be induced by any influence of any kind to deviate from the path of rectitude.

He was proud to be an American, proud that he lived in a land where every citizen is a sovereign and where every man and every woman and every child is free to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. He used to say how proud he was that he lived in a land where labor was exalted to comfortable homes, where the printing press and the church followed close upon the march of empire, where caste was ignored, and where the humblest child of poverty could aspire unrebuked to the highest places in the gift of the Nation. He used to say that men from the worn-out monarchies of Europe could not help but discern that the noblest trend of human progress lay in the direction of republics. In this form, he said, the latent possibilities of the human race might best find expression; that while it guaranteed patriotism, devotion, unselfishness, integrity, truth, and industry, it would make its own reward and live to tell the story of the great achievements of men who gave themselves unselfishly, without thought of self in any form, to the great service of their country, their people, and the world.

God bless the day that gave America WALTER MAGEE and men of his type.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, WALTER MAGEE came to the House of Representatives with a thorough training for his work here. He was a university man. He had been the corporation counsel of one of our great cities. He had acquired the habit of public work and of public thought. He came to this House with a large representation from his own State, probably the largest delegation which had ever come here, and which remained here for a long time.

WALTER MAGEE was not a man of any views except extreme ones. He never could see a matter in a halfway. He always saw it from one side or the other and whenever a question arose in this House which was strongly fought, WALTER MAGEE was always on the one side or the other. In our delegation we had clashing ambitions. We had men who aspired at the same time to the same place and MAGEE was always on the one side or the other of all questions, and it is a curious fact that although he was not a compromiser, although he was not a harmonizer, although he took strong views on every question, MAGEE never created personal antagonism. The men with whom he disagreed, those on the opposite side of questions, liked WALTER MAGEE just as well as those with whom he agreed. He went through the clashes in the delegation, he went through the fights on the floor, with not alone the sincere respect, but also with the love and affection of all those in the House who knew him well, and with those who differed from him loving him and admiring him just as much as those who agreed with his side of questions. His strong attitude toward men and his strong position on public questions was perhaps best illustrated in the fight of Mr. Mann for Speaker. Those of us who were here in those days remember well the tremendous feeling that was engendered in that fight.

Although Mr. Mann had been the undisputed leader of this House for many years, it was not an easy thing, it was not a pleasant thing to espouse his cause, and yet you will all remember that WALTER MAGEE made the best speech, the most convincing, the most eloquent, the most forceful speech that he made in his whole career for James R. Mann at the desk at which I am standing to-day. This was his supreme effort. He put his whole soul and energy and life and thought and devotion into it, and it is a tribute to his courage, it is a tribute to his devotion to his friends that he was able, in spite of the fact he was not on the popular side, that he was not on the winning side, but was on the side on which it was hard to fight, that he made that fight with all the earnestness he possessed. You will remember, later, it was not difficult for anyone to be for his chief, Mr. MADDEN, and you will remember how devoted he was to Mr. MADDEN when the time came to fight for him for Speaker.

So, throughout his career, he had the unique distinction of being an extremist in all his public views, an extremist in his devotions, in his likes and dislikes, yet he had the distinction, in spite of all this, of inspiring a universal affection and an equally universal respect.

I think all of us here to-day can say honestly, and not in a spirit of eulogy, not because it is an occasion of this kind, not because it is the thing to say on a day like this, but I believe every man here who remembers WALTER MAGEE can say that they remember him with affection, they remember him with admiration, that they have no unkind thoughts, no unpleasant memories, that all of his associations were agreeable and friendly and inspired liking and respect.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it was my good fortune, soon after my election to Congress, to be placed upon the Committee on Appropriations. After serving there a while it was my greater good fortune to be placed upon the subcommittee which makes the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture.

In my service on this subcommittee with the Hon. WALTER W. MAGEE as chairman I came into intimate and close contact with him. I became intimate with him and got to know him well. He was one man whom to know well meant to love him. For many years we labored together on this committee. Never during all this period did one harsh word or a single dissension rise between the members of the subcommittee. There was perfect harmony, perfect accord, with WALTER MAGEE guiding the course of that committee.

It has been said here that he was an extreme partisan. Maybe so; I did not discover it in all these years of service. Never during the many occasions I had to deal with him in making appropriations did he permit politics to enter into our deliberations; never did he permit politics to influence his vote upon any appropriation, but with a broad mind taking within its grasp the interests of our entire country, he acted for the best interests of our country. Gentlemen, WALTER MAGEE was a real American patriot.

Friendship! I think if there was ever any man who recognized the ties of true friendship, WALTER MAGEE was that man. If there was any man who ever followed the precepts of the great poet who said, "Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried, grapple them to thy soul with hoops of steel," that man was WALTER MAGEE.

He and I were intimate friends; I think as close as men could be. Though he came from the North and I from the South, he was a consistent Republican and I a consistent Democrat, we were intimate and close friends. There is nothing that he could do for me that he did not do. Of course, I would ask nothing dishonorable, because even if I were so inclined, I would know better than to approach him with such a thought, for, of all things, WALTER MAGEE's guiding star was to be right. When he made up his mind what was right he never compromised with wrong. I do not care to draw comparisons, but in all my association with others it has never been my pleasure to have met a man who was purer in his ideals. I do not believe he ever entertained a dishonest thought—I think that he was incapable of entertaining a dishonest thought.

This, gentlemen, is my conception of his character, and as has well been said by the chairman of our committee, Mr. MADDEN, the world is better for WALTER MAGEE having been born and having lived in it. His life is an example that might well be emulated.

We shall miss him and mourn the vacant chair of one of our most capable and patriotic public servants. No truer or more unprejudiced patriot ever bore the frank mannerism of party alignment, untainted by partisan malice and vindictive politics, than did the chivalric personality of our genuine friend and devotee to the public weal.

Farewell, if ever fondest prayer
Avail for others weal on high—
Mine will not all be lost in air,
But waft thy name beyond the sky.

And:

If that high world which lies beyond
Our own, surviving love endears;
If there the cherished heart be fond
The eye the same, except in tears,
How welcome those untrodden spheres!
How sweet this very hour to die!
To soar from earth, and find all fears
Lost in thy light—Eternity.

It must be so: 'Tis not for self
That we so tremble on the brink;
And, striving to o'er leap the gulf,
Yet cling to beings severing link.
Oh! in that future let us think,
To hold each heart, the heart that shares:
With them the immortal waters drink,
And soul in soul grow deathless theirs.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, having had the privilege of serving for 12 years with WALTER W. MAGEE, and having become somewhat close to him in personal friendship, I feel that I should not let this occasion pass without voicing just a few words of eulogy and commendation of the life, character, and public services of this distinguished public servant. A man of sterling character, a public-spirited citizen of high standing in the community where he lived, and a lawyer of excellent repute, he brought to his service in this House qualifications of an unusually high order.

Early in his service here he was assigned to the great Appropriations Committee which affords extraordinary opportunities for broad, varied, and effective service. He was faithful and constant in his work, giving himself unreservedly to the arduous exacting duties always devolving upon Members of the Appropriations Committee of this House. For a time he served as chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, and in that capacity displayed a remarkable grasp of the numerous and many-sided questions requiring consideration in making appropriations for the benefit of this basic industry. He was a member of the advisory group of his party known as the steering committee of the House, and in this capacity was influential in the consideration and decision of many of the difficult problems presenting themselves for solution in connection with the work of the House.

WALTER MAGEE was a forceful and effective debater and possessed fine capacity of explaining and directing the consideration of his bills on the floor of the House. He was probably at his best in the public forum of political debate, and was recognized as one of the very effective stump speakers of his party. He was sought as a speaker before political and other clubs as well as on the stump during political campaigns, and was always ready to do his part in this direction.

The country is fortunate in being able to draw to its public service such men as WALTER MAGEE, who at the sacrifice of personal and financial fortune are ready to give themselves unreservedly to the service of the public in places of great and trying responsibility. In his death this House, his district, his State, and the entire country suffer a great loss.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, the death of a real friend so overwhelms one that time alone can alleviate the sorrow. Humbly and meekly I approach this sad occasion to do reverence and honor to one of the best, truest, and tried friends of my official life. The untimely taking of the distinguished statesman whose life, character, and services we memorialize here to-day has made a deep and profound impression upon me.

Day by day we are impressed with the uncertainties of life. We see our comrades being stricken one by one; and if we believed this life ended it all, terrible would be the picture.

It was Victor Hugo who said:

> The nearer I approach the end, the plainer I hear around me the immortal symphonies of the worlds which unite me. It is marvelous, yet simple. It is a fairy tale, and it is a history. For half a century I have been writing my thoughts in prose, verse, history, philosophy, drama, romance, tradition, satire, ode, song—I have tried all. But I feel that I have not said the thousandth part of what is in me. When I go down to the grave I can say, like so many others, "I have finished my day's work," but I can not say, "I have finished my life." My day's work will begin the next morning. The tomb is not a blind alley, it is a thoroughfare. It closes in the twilight, it opens with the dawn.

This beautiful realization of immortality and the hereafter recognized by all of us and the foundation of our belief in God and His greatness and goodness gives to us hope and comfort that the splendid life and works of our friend WALTER WARREN MAGEE are not finished but will be glorified, transformed, and continued in a better clime and in more beautiful surroundings.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, we are met here to-day to pay respect to our departed colleague, who served in this House with distinction to himself and honor to his country.

WALTER MAGEE was my personal friend. We came here in the Sixty-fourth Congress, and from the very first, coming as we did from the same part of the State, we became very closely associated, not only politically but personally. He was a man of more than ordinary personality and very strong likes and dislikes. When he had once made up his mind on anything you might just as well consider that settled, for no matter what the argument, he never changed. Yet he was of the kindest disposition, always sympathetic and most friendly to everyone.

He was a lover of sports and outdoor life and always took a deep interest in athletic contests of every kind, and in earlier life was an athlete of no mean repute.

In his congressional duties he was one of the most conscientious Members I have ever known, and every request, every duty, received careful and scrupulous attention.

He was assigned to the Appropriations Committee early in his service, and from the very first up to the last he gave that work the best there was in him. I doubt if he ever missed a meeting of his committee, and by nature as well as by legal training he was especially well fitted for that work. He mastered every detail, and when he handled a bill on the floor he knew it from beginning to end, which was his secret of success as a subcommittee chairman.

For many years I occupied an office near to his, and there was hardly a day he did not drop in for a few minutes to discuss various matters pertaining to our work, and in all these years I do not now remember an important measure that we did not vote on the same side.

In every way WALTER MAGEE was a real man, and when he once told you what he was going to do, you did not need to ask him the next day where he stood. He was as sure and solid as they make them, and my great regret is there are not more like him in public life. For in these troublesome times we need men of his ability, character, and determination. No man ever said that WALTER MAGEE lacked the courage of his convictions, or did not have the backbone to stand up for what he believed to be right.

The larger part of his mature life was given to public service, and every act was characterized by that able, honest, and faithful administration that contributes to the welfare and happiness of our people. He loved political campaigns and debates, and it was here that he was at his best. He was a most popular political speaker in our part of the State, and everywhere he spoke they wanted him the next year. He certainly will be missed when they call the roll of faithful party men in the coming presidential election.

By his death not only his family and the State of New York, but the American Congress suffered a great loss. He was one of our most useful and valuable Members and a man we could ill afford to lose.

WALTER MAGEE, the man, has gone to his last resting place, but the influence of a useful life, strong personalty, and indomitable devotion to the public welfare will long live in the hearts of a devoted people.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, when WALTER WARREN MAGEE was called to take his place at the judgment seat of the Great Father of us all, a pang of grief cut keenly into the hearts of all who knew him. All seemed to feel a personal bereavement. Staggered and shocked by the blow, nevertheless there soon came to every lip the most generous, kindly, and tender encomiums, for no man ever occupied a seat in this body who left behind him sweeter or more fragrant memories. Fortunate are those who knew him, for his was a personality that spontaneously disseminated kindliness and human sympathy and dispelled at once the mists of mistrust which so often keep men of real sterling merit from establishing closer acquaintanceship.

With WALTER MAGEE there were no such barriers. There was the light of kindliness and trustfulness in his genial eyes, and his smile was like the generous warm flash of the morning sunshine.

In a large parliamentary body such as this it is naturally difficult to establish many close friendships. The bulk of the membership consists of men of distinction who have been the recipients of high honors from their local constituencies and they are thus accustomed not only to deference but to having the initiative toward friendship taken by others. Blest indeed is he who can take and bear high honors with humility. Only the salt of the earth can do it—for that is the sure sign of genuine greatness.

The world is gradually shifting its viewpoint in the admeasurement of men. Historians no longer accord the laurel to those who have built up their reputations on violence, ambition, and injustice. The prize of true greatness is rather given to those who have founded their careers on kindliness, generosity, and justice. Bluster and ostentation, pride and haughtiness, are no longer the fashion.

History accords the highest places to the good; and likewise in our admeasurement of the men of our own day we give our love, our admiration, and our devotion to those whom it is possible to count among our friends. Such a man was WALTER WARREN MAGEE. Without attempting to touch upon his mere earthly successes, or to praise his political achievements, or without even attempting to consider the place which he is destined to occupy among the statesmen of our country, I feel that it is only my function and my duty here to-day to express my personal estimate of him as a man and as a friend and as such to register my humble opinion that WALTER WARREN MAGEE was one of those rare personalities whom to have known was a joy and to have counted as a friend was a legacy to be cherished and forever remembered.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I should like, if I may, to pay my very humble and sincere tribute to WALTER MAGEE, whose memory we are here to honor, from the standpoint simply of a friend and constituent. When WALTER MAGEE died on May 25 last the people of the Thirty-fifth congressional district of New York were saddened, for they loved WALTER MAGEE as it is seldom given to a man in public life to be loved by those whom he served. We admired him for his ability and attainments. We respected him for his strength and courage, but he was held high in the affections of the tens of thousands who claimed him as a personal friend, because he had the personality and those human qualities which endear one to his fellow beings. He was straightforward, sincere, simple, loyal, gracious, considerate, and bore himself with the unaffected dignity which befitted his position and which marks a gentleman. We were proud of WALTER MAGEE, proud of his blameless life, his career of usefulness, his position of prestige and influence in this body. We were proud to be represented by such a man. Like his legion of friends, I hold in fond memory the kindly smile, the warm handclasp, and the hearty "How are you?" with which he greeted us.

The life of WALTER MAGEE has many prototypes among those who have made this Nation great. Born in comparatively humble circumstances on a farm in western New York he had no inheritance of material wealth, but he was richly endowed with character, with health, with ambition, and with native ability. He went to the public schools in his neighborhood and for a little while to the Geneseo Normal School. His family could afford to carry his schooling no further, but, determined to have a higher education, he worked and saved the money which took him through Exeter Academy, from which he was graduated in 1885, and through Harvard University, from which he was graduated in 1889. He studied law in Syracuse and was admitted to the bar in 1891. He entered upon his professional career as a lawyer without the backing of wealthy or influential friends but with the enthusiasm and earnestness that was characteristic of him. His ability as a lawyer and his fidelity to his clients soon brought him recognition as a leader of the bar. He was known as an aggressive, uncompromising, fighting trial lawyer, who always came into court fully prepared, feared no opponent, was confident of himself and sure of the justice of the cause he espoused.

Early in his career he was elected supervisor of Onondaga County, a position he held from 1892 to 1893. In 1904 he became corporation counsel of the city of Syracuse and definitely gave up private practice for public service. For 10 years he held that office with distinction. The zeal with which he safeguarded the city's interests, and the incorruptible integrity he exhibited in that office will be gratefully remembered by his contemporaries as long as they live. In 1916 he was elected to the Sixty-fourth Congress, and he was reelected to successive Congresses with increasing majorities until his death.

You who served with him here have borne eloquent testimony to the affection and respect in which he was held by his colleagues and to the great and enduring service which he rendered to his country. I as his successor enter upon my career in Congress with a feeling of great humility and with the knowledge that I can find no more perfect model on which to fashion my career here, be it short or long, than that of WALTER MAGEE.

I knew him best as a man and a citizen. If I were asked to name his outstanding trait I would say it was his loyalty, and in my creed there is no finer human attribute. It embraces courage, steadfastness, and unselfishness. No higher tribute can be paid to any man and no more inspiring epitaph inscribed upon his monument than the simple words "He was loyal." It means more than extravagant encomiums and fulsome praise. WALTER MAGEE was a loyal man, loyal to his country, to his church, to his family, to his principles, to his friends, and his loyalty was militant, unwavering, and outspoken. No one ever remained long in doubt as to where WALTER MAGEE stood.

He never worshiped the god of mammon. He never devoted his splendid abilities to the accumulation of dollars. He was more concerned with the welfare and prosperity of the country he loved and served than with his personal fortunes. He lived modestly and gave generously according to his means, but he was lavish in giving time and effort to a cause in which he believed or in behalf of a friend. His death at the time of his greatest usefulness, in the full vigor of his manhood, was a tragic loss to his community and to the country. In these days of radicalism, bolshevism, sentimentalism, and internationalism we need the sturdy Americanism of WALTER MAGEE.

Whatever the great adventure of death holds for us, we know all is well with our friend, but we can ill afford to lose such a man. We knew him as a generous and kindly friend, as a great and patriotic American, and as a high-minded and upright man. We loved him in life, we mourn him in death, and we will cherish and honor his memory always. The world is better because he lived; we are better men for having known him.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, over the door of every profession, every occupation, every calling, the world has a standing advertisement: "Wanted—A man." There are men yet in this world, there will ever be those who can not be seared by avarice or seduced by power, there will ever be those who are gentle and the servant of a tender conscience, who have learned to love all beauty, whether of nature or of art, those who hate vileness and respect others as they do themselves.

The recollection which I shall ever cherish of WALTER WARREN MAGEE, and which I am sure was certainly one of the outstanding attributes of his useful and noble life, was that wonderful, gentle sympathy, which so soon engaged the interest of those with whom he came into contact and won their complete confidence; his handshake was magic; his companionship was the inspiration of the fullest confidence; and when he told you he was interested in you and your project you could no longer doubt.

I deeply regret that the Congress of the United States offers so few opportunities for its membership to become intimately acquainted; I am convinced that it takes long years of congressional contact for us to learn of each other in a sense which will truly uncover our ideals and make known our real integrity, ability, and usefulness. Service upon a committee brings us together, and usually this is the touchstone of our friendship and the medium through which we form our estimate of each other. It is here we often make the friendships of a lifetime and fix the proper estimate of value upon each other's service; and if you will stop to think, this contact is very limited even in a long service.

It is a common experience in this life that we meet along its pathway some congenial spirit—some pilgrim—whose character is replete with human sympathy and surcharged with that which the world loves, though it may sometimes fail to reward, unselfishness; when we do we have a deeper appreciation of human life and a firmer conviction that there is something akin to God in that creature made in His image.

I shall leave to others to speak of the exalted and useful career of our beloved colleague; a short acquaintance does not qualify me to speak of these things as well as others. It is this tribute I wish to add to whatever may be said on this occasion. Mr. MAGEE's gentleness and his sympathy, his unselfish interest in the welfare of his fellow man, his ability to work with and aid others, those qualities made for him a majestic personality, and made him, in my opinion, one of the most useful men who ever entered the portal of this Hall.

The narrow, stingy soul is not lovable; people shrink from such a character; there must be heartiness in the expression, in the smile, in the hand shake, in the cordiality, which is unmistakable. The divine instinct in man impels him to long for the sunshine and loath the shadows. It has been well said that "if you radiate sweetness and light, people will love to get near you." Those who wanted to get near WALTER WARREN MAGEE could do so; you did not have to tear away any conventionalism; there was nothing artificial about him, and when you came near him the gentleness of his nature, the warmth of his personality, and the magic of his soul held them by an indefinable force which no eventuality of life could sever.

I wish I knew the whole history of our colleague's life. I apprehend that he has ever been the simple, unselfish servant of his fellow men, the big-hearted, generous friend—ready to help everybody and everything out of their troubles. We are not surprised that he was honored as few men can be in this life by his fellow men. It is this kind of man who puts most into life, and real success should ever be determined by what we put into life rather than by what we take out of it.

WALTER WARREN MAGEE was a man—just such a man as the world will ever need; he crossed the stage and made human history nobler, and left behind an influence which will bless the world ten thousand years. May his example of friendship and fidelity keep guard in this great Chamber as long as the Republic shall exist, and may the sweet, tender recollections of his life make happy all those who loved him.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of the House: The grim reaper shows very little consideration when he demands his toll. The rich and the poor, the high and the low, must answer the summons, and as one of our great writers has said:

The spear of the prince and the staff of the pauper must eventually lie side by side.

So the call came to our friend and colleague, WALTER MAGEE. At the height of his career, the cup of life, all fragrant with success, was dashed from his lips.

When I came here in the Sixty-sixth Congress he had been here for four years. He was my friend from the very moment of my acquaintance with him, and he never lost an opportunity to greet me with a cheery "Hello, FRANK," and a clasp of the hand that was genuine. His favorite expression, "What's on your mind," was not a mere perfunctory question, for he was always ready and willing to listen to your troubles, real or imaginary, and from his great fund of experience give you in a few well-chosen words, his advice. His word was as good as his bond, for to him truth was an imperial virtue.

His taking-away was very sudden. The news came to us all as a tremendous shock, coming as it did without a note of warning of any kind.

It has been said that he was an ardent partisan in his political faith, and I think that statement has been made advisedly. However, he was a fair fighter and never struck a blow that was foul. He has gone from our midst, but his memory will remain with us all as the years go by; and, after all, that is the beauty of these services. We come here not to mourn or to sorrow, but to say a few words in memory of these men whose courage and integrity made an impression upon us during life and who served their country with patriotism and devotion. This hour we can devote to tender recollections, and at the same time scatter just a few flowers, a few roses and forget-me-nots, along memory lane.

The blessing of immortality and our belief in it tells us that we shall see him again some day. Until then we shall just say, with the great poet—

He is not dead, he is just away.

I admired WALTER MAGEE because he had courage, the courage to speak and to vote his convictions, and this characteristic is the more valuable in this day and generation when the tendency in political life is too often to say the expedient and the soft thing rather than to say the thing that is sometimes harsh and disagreeable. He served in this House over a period of more than 12 years. During this time he earned and merited the respect of Members on both sides of the aisle.

His forceful presentations and his charming personality will be missed in this House of Representatives. He has solved the great problem and his soul is marching on. His plan of life is well expressed in the closing lines of Bryant's masterpiece, Thanatopsis:

So live that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, to commemorate the services of a departed and worthy colleague is a sorrowful but inspiring ceremony of the Congress. We whom the Almighty has left to carry toward completion the tremendous work of governing in which the late Hon. WALTER MAGEE participated modestly and effectively can look back upon his services and receive a moral impetus toward a conscientious character of public effort.

Representative MAGEE was my neighbor in the House Office Building. In no walk of life have I ever met a more courteous man. His industry in behalf of his constituents was unflagging. His attention to general legislation was given with a patriotic devotion. The special work of his own committee attracted him to an almost absorbing degree.

Such officials as he have served greatly to elevate the standing of those in political endeavors in the public mind. He gave far more than he received from the people.

Those who loved him and who mourn him may find consolation in the great respect and affection that we who worked beside him honestly entertained for this distinguished Representative from New York whose memory we would honor to-day.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor and a privilege to come here to-day and speak in memory of my friend and colleague WALTER MAGEE, to pay tribute to him on account of his sterling qualities and because of his notable and distinguished record as a national legislator. I assume that most of you Members of the House when you first came to Congress looked for some older and experienced Member and relied upon him to solve the difficulties that arise and the various problems with which a new Member is confronted. I never knew WALTER MAGEE before I came to the House, but I was immediately attracted to him by his lovable personality. I always went to him when in difficulty and always received a sympathetic hearing and sound advice. There was no Member of Congress who had better or sounder judgment on all political matters. There was one important issue in which we were both very much interested and that was to try to have established in the House of Representatives a special committee to handle veterans' relief legislation. For almost a year, as the older Members of the House will recall, a bill was pending in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to increase the pay of the attendants of the blinded soldiers from $20 to $40 a month, but because of the excessive number of bills that went to that committee it was impossible to secure a hearing or get action on this very small but important piece of legislation. Through the influence and efforts of WALTER MAGEE, who was a member of the important steering committee, the bill was finally reported out and passed in the House. As a result of the delay in reporting that particular bill, and because of his interest in it, the House was made aware of the fact, which to-day we all must acknowledge, that it was utterly impossible for the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to properly handle soldier relief legislation along with their other work.

As the sponsor of that bill to afford relief to the blinded veterans, I want to give all credit to WALTER MAGEE not only for having the bill reported out and passed, but practically for initiating and calling the attention of the House to the fact that if the veterans were to secure the relief to which they are entitled through legislation, it was necessary to establish a new committee in this House. He had for the disabled soldiers not only the lip service which is common to all of us, but he had in his heart the profoundest sympathy for them and felt earnestly that we should do more for the disabled soldiers and not permit veteran relief bills to be sidetracked or delayed. He believed that we should not simply compensate and hospitalize and rehabilitate the disabled soldiers, but that they should have priority in legislation and that there should be some sympathetic legislation passed whereby the soldiers should automatically come into their rights. It was in this connection that I formed the closest association with WALTER MAGEE, and when anything came up affecting the disabled soldiers before the Committee on Veterans' Relief was established, we new Members of the House who were veterans always went to him as the one we could depend upon to help us get the legislation we were trying in those days to secure for all of the disabled soldiers, and we never went in vain. He was a fearless champion of the disabled veterans and was always willing to give of his time and energy in their cause.

He was so modest that other Members of the House probably did not know that WALTER MAGEE was practically the leader in securing justice, not charity, for our disabled veterans. WALTER MAGEE always tried to use his influence to help other Members, and I for one feel under great obligations to him because when I first came to Congress eight years ago, he was one of the closest friends I had in the New York delegation and the one upon whom I could always depend for encouragement and advice.

He was a lovable character and had a charming personality. It is not surprising that all of his colleagues from New York and his Democratic friends have come here to-day to do honor and pay tribute to his memory.

None knew him but to love him, nor named him but to praise.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, in the days that have passed since our good friend and colleague WALTER MAGEE crossed the river that marks the unknown shore it has seemed to me that he has just gone away and will be back with us once more. We have mightily missed his hearty handshake and his sincere salutation. From him emanated an atmosphere of wholesomeness, sincerity, honesty, and earnestness of purpose. He was all that the term expresses "a man." He stood among his fellow men with an upright head and a straightforward eye, unafraid and unabashed. His thoughts and his actions were open books. He had a clear conscience and was unafraid. He had nothing to conceal. He had strong convictions of right and wrong and did not hesitate to express them.

What a great asset he was to the country which he served. He brought to his labors here a well-trained mind, a fixity of purpose, unstinted diligence, and sound judgment. He sought no plaudits. He avoided the forensic arena, but in the councils of the Members of this body, where the mighty questions affecting the destiny and welfare of the country are determined, he was a tower of strength. His passing away was a great loss to the Congress, to the country, and to the community that he so ably represented.

I can not say, I will not say,
That he is dead; he is just away.
With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand
He has wandered into an unknown land,
And left us dreaming how very fair
It needs must be, since he lingers there.
Think of him still the same, I say:
He is not dead, he is just away.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, our beloved and departed friend, WALTER MAGEE, entered the House of Representatives mentally trained and morally anchored; and in the drift of things, as I see them in the country to-day, there was never a more outstanding need for men who are fixed and grounded in the fundamentals of government as was our splendid colleague.

In the offices of friendship I doff my cap to the memory of a loyal friend, of a faithful comrade, even in adversity. WALTER MAGEE came into my home as one almost unknown. He left there as one beloved. It has been said that in the warp and woof of this Government of ours, in its very fabric, are those who have put unrequited toil and unrecognized achievement. WALTER MAGEE is one of those; and if our Government goes on to its greater and greater destiny of impressing upon the world the leadership of democracy and the fundamentals, if you please, of a Government of opportunity for anyone, without regard to birth or creed, religion or tradition, it is because men of WALTER MAGEE'S type have put of themselves into this Government and held it true to the course charted in our Constitution.

Faithful in service, yes, faithful in all that goes to make life dear, it can be truthfully said of WALTER MAGEE as the poet Lowell himself has said:

The beauty of his better self lives on
In minds he touched with fire, in many an eye
He trained to Truth's exact severity;
He was a Teacher: why be grieved for him
Whose living word still stimulates the air?
In endless file shall loving legislators come
The glow of his transmitted touch to share.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have 10 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the life, character, and public services of the late Hon. WALTER W. MAGEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, WALTER MAGEE represented the district adjoining mine in Congress for over 12 years. At home he lived only 25 miles from me. In the four years that I served with him—and all that time on the same committee with him, the great Committee on Appropriations—I found him most courteous, most helpful, and always devoted to his work.

He was a close student and devoted himself to the task in hand till he had mastered it. He was a forceful and convincing speaker and was often in demand in a political campaign.

In presenting the appropriation bill, of which he annually had charge, he showed marked skill and was always able to secure its passage without any substantial amendments being adopted.

To his constituents and to his district he was most faithful and spent his entire time in serving them.
